Introduction

1. At each of its sessions for many years, the Conference has had to suspend certain provisions of its Standing Orders to be able to implement the format of discussions and other arrangements proposed by the Governing Body to improve the functioning of the Conference. At the last three sessions of the Conference, the proposed suspensions were set out in a Provisional Record published before the opening of the Conference. This document contains the suspensions proposed for the 107th Session of the Conference.
2. Moreover, at its 332nd Session (March 2018), the Governing Body discussed proposals to concentrate the approval of all formalities necessary to set the Conference in motion during the opening sitting of the Conference, including some of the formalities carried out by the Selection Committee, such as the setting of the closing date for the registration of speakers in plenary, suggestions to facilitate the work of the Conference and its committees, or invitations to international non-governmental organizations to participate in committees. In view of the support received for those proposals, this document sets out the decisions that the Conference is invited to take in this regard at its opening sitting.<sup>1</sup>

Proposed suspension of various provisions of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference

Report of the Director-General

3. In order for the Director-General to continue presenting a thematic Report to each session of the Conference, including in non-budgetary years when the Director-General is required to report on programme implementation, it is necessary to suspend article 12(2) of the Standing Orders to the extent necessary to permit the thematic Report to be submitted along with the Programme implementation report, under article 12.

World of Work Summit

4. For the ILO World of Work Summit, to the extent necessary to enable statements of Heads of State and Government, Prime Ministers and Vice-Presidents, and interactive panel-style sessions, it is proposed to suspend:
  - (a) the limitation concerning the number of statements by each member State in plenary and, to that extent, article 12, paragraph 3;
  - (b) the provisions regarding time limits of speeches and, to that extent, article 14, paragraph 6;
  - (c) the sequence in which the speakers are given the floor, in order to facilitate an exchange of views and, to that extent, the provisions of article 14, paragraph 2; and
  - (d) the rules on moving the closure of the discussion provided in article 16.

Records of the Conference

5. As regards the records of the Conference, it is proposed to continue suspending several provisions of article 23, namely:
  - (a) paragraph 1, to the extent necessary, to permit the publication of the Provisional Records containing the speeches made during the plenary discussion of the reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General only after the Conference; and
  - (b) paragraph 3, with respect to the deadline for receiving proposed corrections to the Provisional Records, to permit that all records – those published during the session as well as those published afterwards – be reviewed together within the same time period following the Conference.

Resolutions Committee

6. Following agreement at the 319th Session of the Governing Body (October 2013) not to reactivate the Resolutions Committee, the provisions of the Standing Orders concerning the referral to the Resolutions Committee of resolutions relating to matters not included in an item placed on the agenda would have to be suspended, as has been done since 2006 in non-budgetary years when such resolutions were receivable. It is accordingly proposed to suspend the provisions of paragraphs 3, 4 and 10 of article 17 of the Standing Orders.

Time limits for filing objections and complaints with the Credentials Committee

7. To enable the Committee to examine all objections and complaints in time, it is proposed to reduce the time limit for lodging objections from 72 to 48 hours from the opening of the Conference (and from 48 to 24 hours from the publication of a Revised list of delegations) (with the possibility for the Committee to make exceptions) and to reduce the time limit for complaints from seven to five days. In addition to suspending article 26bis(1)(a) and article 26ter(3)(a) to the extent that they provide for the current, longer time limits, this also requires adopting amended provisions to replace them, which provide for the new, shorter, time limits. For the duration of the 107th Session of the Conference only, the relevant provisions would thus read as follows (proposed changes appear in bold):

ARTICLE 26BIS

Objections

1. An objection in pursuance of article 5, paragraph 2(a), shall not be receivable in the following cases:

- (a) if the objection is not lodged with the Secretary-General within 48 hours from 10 a.m. of the first day of the Conference, the date of publication in the Provisional Record of the official list of delegations, on the basis of the presence of a person's name or functions on this list, or its absence. If the objection is based on a revised list, the time limit shall be reduced to 24 hours;

3. A complaint shall be receivable if:

- (a) it is lodged with the Secretary-General of the Conference before 10 a.m. on the fifth day following the opening of the Conference or, thereafter, in the case of a complaint referred to in paragraph 2, it is lodged within 48 hours of the alleged act or omission preventing attendance of the delegate or adviser concerned, and if the Committee considers that there is sufficient time to deal with it properly; and

Appointment of Government representatives in committees

8. It is proposed to test at this session of the Conference a simplified system of government representation in all committees to which section H of the Standing Orders applies, whereby governments would no longer have to communicate to the secretariat of the Conference the name of their representatives in the committee, but only the name of the country registered as regular or deputy Government member of the committee. Once registered as a member of a committee, a government would be validly represented by any of its delegates or advisers accredited to the Conference. It is therefore proposed that the Conference suspend article 56(2) of the Standing Orders.<sup>2</sup>

Adoption of committee reports

9. Since 2014, technical committees have delegated to their officers the authority to approve their reports to avoid the holding of an additional committee sitting to adopt the reports before their submission to the plenary. This does not in itself require the suspension of any Standing Orders. However, with respect to standard-setting committees, whose reports contain a proposed instrument or proposed conclusions, it would be necessary to suspend article 67 – which concerns the possibility for a standard-setting committee to consider amendments to the text of a proposed instrument submitted by its drafting committee – to avoid that the committee has to hold an additional sitting for the adoption of the report containing the proposed instrument. It is therefore proposed to suspend article 67.

Decisions concerning the programme of the Conference

10. As mentioned in paragraph 2, it is proposed that the plenary adopt certain decisions regarding formalities, which include the adoption of the tentative plan of work of the Conference and its committees and the setting of the closing date for the registration of speakers in plenary, as set out in the second part of this Provisional Record. Under article 4, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders, it is the duty of the Selection Committee to arrange the programme of the Conference and to fix the time and agenda for the plenary sittings. It is therefore proposed to suspend article 4, paragraph 2, to the extent necessary to allow for such decisions to be taken directly in plenary at the opening sitting as proposed.

Other decisions and procedural formalities

Discussion of the Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General: Opening date for the discussion and closing date for the list of speakers

11. It is proposed that the discussion of the Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General will begin on Thursday, 31 May, at 10 a.m., and that the list of speakers will be closed on the same day at 6 p.m., under the usual conditions.

Tentative plan of work

12. Appendix I sets the tentative plan of work for the 107th Session of the Conference, including the proposed timing of the record votes concerning the abrogation of six Conventions and the withdrawal of Recommendations as well as the amendments to the Code of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006). It is proposed to schedule the votes on Tuesday, 5 June, in the morning after the examination of the report of the Selection Committee scheduled to take place on Monday, 4 June, in the morning. At the end of the discussion of the report of the Selection Committee, the President of the Conference will make the announcement of the holding of the votes in advance, including the fixed period during which the votes will be scheduled.
13. A draft plan of work for committees, which is not binding but would enable them, in organizing their work, to take maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference, is also included in Appendix I and submitted for the Conference's consideration and endorsement, to allow committee chairpersons to fix the date and time of the sittings in accordance with article 60 of the Standing Orders.

Abrogation of Conventions Nos 21, 50, 64, 65, 86 and 104 and withdrawal of Recommendations Nos 7, 61 and 62

14. The abrogation of Conventions Nos 21, 50, 64, 65, 86 and 104 and the withdrawal of Recommendations Nos 7, 61 and 62 is the seventh item on the agenda of this session of the Conference. In line with article 45bis(3) of the Standing Orders and past practice, it is proposed that the Conference refer this agenda item to the Selection Committee for discussion on the basis of Report VII(2). It is proposed to schedule the final record vote for Tuesday, 5 June, in the morning.

Approval of the amendments to the Code of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended

15. The approval of amendments to the Code of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006), as adopted by the Special Tripartite Committee established under Article XIII of the Convention is the eighth item on the agenda of the Conference. The text of the amendments together with a commentary appear in Provisional Record 1C. In line with the practice followed at the 103rd Session (2014) and 105th Session (2016), where previous amendments to the MLC, 2006, were approved by the Conference, it is proposed that the amendments be noted by the Selection Committee before they are referred to the plenary and submitted for the record vote, which it is proposed to schedule on Tuesday, 5 June, at the same time as the record vote on the proposed abrogation or withdrawal of nine international labour standards.

Confirmation of the *Rules for Regional Meetings

16. At its 332nd Session (March 2018), the Governing Body, based on the recommendations of the Working Party on the Functioning of the Governing Body and the International Labour Conference, approved a number of amendments to the Rules for Regional Meetings<sup>3</sup> and decided to submit the revised Rules for Regional Meetings to the Conference for confirmation at this Session of the Conference, in accordance with article 38, paragraph 2, of the Constitution. These Rules, as amended, appear in Provisional Record 1B. The Governing Body has proposed that the Conference, rather than constituting a Standing Orders Committee, refer the revised Rules to the Selection Committee for its consideration with a view to their confirmation by the Conference.<sup>4</sup>

Suggestions to facilitate the work of the Conference

17. It is proposed that the Conference confirm the following principles established in previous years by the Selection Committee:

(a) Quorum

- (i) The quorum will be fixed provisionally, on the basis of the credentials received, in the brief report of the Chairperson of the Governing Body on the day before the opening of the Conference; the said report is published as a Provisional Record. This provisional quorum will remain unchanged until the Credentials Committee determines the quorum on the basis of registrations, it being understood that, if an important vote were to take place in the initial stages of the Conference (once the Credentials Committee has been appointed), the Conference might request the Credentials Committee to determine the quorum in an urgent report.
- (ii) Thereafter, the quorum will be adjusted, under the authority of the Credentials Committee, so as to take into account new registrations and notices of departure from delegates leaving the Conference.
- (iii) Delegates should register personally, immediately on arrival, as the quorum is calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered.
- (iv) Acceptance of appointment as a delegate implies an obligation to be available in Geneva personally, or through an adviser authorized to act as a substitute for the work of the Conference until its end, as important votes often take place on the last day.
- (v) Delegates who are nevertheless obliged to leave the Conference before it finishes should give notice of their forthcoming departure to the secretariat of the Conference.

The form utilized <sup>5</sup> to indicate their date of departure also enables them to authorize an adviser to act and to vote in their place. At group meetings held during the second half of the Conference, the attention of members of the groups will be drawn to the importance of completing and handing in this form.

- (vi) In addition, one Government delegate of a country may report the departure of the other Government delegate, and the secretaries of the Employers' and Workers' groups may also give notice of the final departure of members of their groups, who have not authorized advisers to act in their place.
- (vii) When the record votes are taken, in principle on 5 June 2018, while committees are sitting, delegates are both entitled and expected to leave committees to vote unless they are replaced by a substitute in plenary. Announcements are made in the committees to ensure that all delegates are aware that record votes are taking place. Appropriate arrangements will be made for delegates attending committee meetings in the ILO building.

(b) Punctuality

Committee chairpersons are strongly encouraged to start proceedings punctually, irrespective of the number of persons present, but on condition that votes will not be taken unless a quorum is clearly present. This is particularly important in view of the two-week format of the Conference.

(c) Negotiations

In order to facilitate more continuous negotiation in committees among delegates, representatives of each group should meet with the chairperson and reporter of the committee and with the representative of the Secretary-General, whenever this is desirable, to ensure that the leaders of each group know fully the minds of the delegates in the other groups. The function of these informal meetings is to afford opportunities for a fuller understanding of differences of view before definite positions have crystallized.

Participation in Conference committees by Members having lost the right to vote

18. At its 239th Session (February–March 1988), the Governing Body considered the implications of the appointment, as regular members of Conference committees, of representatives of a member State which had lost the right to vote under article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution of the ILO. It noted that, while the appointment of Employer and Worker representatives from such a State had no practical implications, because the Employers' and Workers' groups operated an effective system under article 56, paragraph 5(b), of the Conference Standing Orders for ensuring that deputy members of a committee voted in the place of regular members deprived of the right to vote, the same was not true of the Government group. As a result, if a government that has lost the right to vote is appointed as a regular member of a committee, the distribution of votes between the three groups is distorted because the weighting of votes is based on the full regular membership and in practice the Government regular members of committees who are unable to vote do not make use of the possibility afforded by article 56, paragraph 5(a), of appointing a deputy member to vote in their place.

19. The Governing Body accordingly recommended that, in order to avoid such distortions, members of the Government group should not apply for regular membership of committees if they were not at the time in question entitled to vote. Should this practice, which has been maintained at all sessions of the Conference since 1987, for any reason not be fully respected, the weighting coefficients in committees should be calculated on the basis of the number of Government members entitled to vote.
20. The Conference is invited to confirm that the calculation of weighting coefficients for votes in committees should be based on the number of regular Government members entitled to vote.

Requests for representation in Conference committees submitted by non-governmental international organizations

21. In accordance with article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Governing Body has invited certain international non-governmental organizations to be represented at the present session of the Conference, it being understood that it would be for the Conference to consider their requests to be present at the committees dealing with items on the agenda in which they have expressed a particular interest.
22. In accordance with article 56, paragraph 9, of the Standing Orders, the Conference may wish to invite the organizations listed in Appendix II to be represented in the committees stated.

Electronic voting system

23. A description of the electronic voting system, to be used in principle for all votes in plenary sittings in accordance with article 19, paragraph 15, of the Standing Orders, is attached in Appendix III.

Appendix III

The electronic voting system

The electronic system provides for votes (in most cases: yes, no, abstention) to be expressed by means of a “voting station” that will be made available to all delegates or persons empowered to vote on their behalf.

Where the electronic system is used outside the Assembly Hall, the President will announce the time at which the vote will be opened and closed. The results of such vote will be announced by the President and presented in the Assembly Hall at a time announced in advance.

Where the electronic system is used in the Assembly Hall, the subject and question to be voted on will be displayed and the President will announce the beginning of the vote. After the President has made sure that all delegates have been given sufficient opportunity to record their vote in one of the voting stations available to them, the President will announce the closure of the vote.

Where the method of vote is by show of hands, once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required.

Where a record vote is taken, once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. These indications will subsequently be published together with a list of the delegates who have voted, showing how each has voted.

In the case of a secret ballot, once all votes have been registered, the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. There will be absolutely no access possible to individual votes nor will there be any record of how each delegate has voted.

It is important that each delegate should already have decided whether he or she or another member of their delegation will exercise the right to vote in a given case. Where more than one vote is nevertheless cast on behalf of a delegate at two different moments, or from two different places, only the first vote will be recognized, whether made by a delegate, by a substitute delegate or by an adviser who has received a specific written authorization to that end. Such specific authorizations must reach the secretariat sufficiently before the opening of voting is announced, so as to be duly recorded.

This document is printed in limited numbers to minimize the environmental impact of the ILO's activities and contribute to climate neutrality. Delegates and observers are kindly requested to bring their copies to meetings and to avoid asking for additional ones. All ILC documents are available on the Internet at www.ilo.org.

Le présent document a été tiré à un nombre restreint d'exemplaires, afin de réduire autant que possible l'impact environnemental des activités de l'OIT et de contribuer à la neutralité climatique. Nous serions reconnaissants aux délégués et aux observateurs de bien vouloir se rendre aux réunions munis de leurs propres exemplaires afin de ne pas avoir à en demander d'autres. Nous rappelons que tous les documents de la CIT sont consultables sur Internet à l'adresse <http://www.ilo.org>.

Se ha impreso un número limitado de copias del presente documento para reducir al mínimo el impacto ambiental de las actividades de la OIT y contribuir a la neutralidad climática. Se ruega a los delegados y a los observadores que lleven consigo sus copias cuando asistan a las reuniones y que se abstengan de pedir copias adicionales. Todos los documentos de la CIT se pueden obtener en línea en la dirección www.ilo.org.

Presidents: Mr Cortebeek, Chairperson of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and Mr Murad

Opening of the session

Mr Cortebeek

Chairperson of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office

It is my honour as Chairperson of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office for 2017–18 to declare open this 107th Session of the International Labour Conference.

May I take this opportunity to extend to all of you a warm welcome to Geneva and to our Conference. I am confident that this year's session will live up to the expectations and trust that have been placed in it.

Election of the President of the Conference

Mr Cortebeek

Chairperson of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office

Without further ado, let us move to the first item on our agenda of this morning, under which the Conference is called on to elect its President.

I give the floor to Ms Paik, the Government representative of the Republic of Korea and current Chairperson of the Government group, to put forward the nomination.

Ms Paik

Government (Republic of Korea), speaking on behalf of the Government group

On behalf of the Government group and as its Chairperson, it is my honour to put forward the candidature of Mr Samir Murad, Minister of Labour of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, as President of the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. Mr Murad's candidature was unanimously endorsed by the Government group.

As Minister of Labour, Mr Murad is also Chair of the Jordanian Social Security Corporation, the Vocational Training Corporation, and the Employment, Technical and Vocational Education and Training Fund. Prior to his most recent appointment as Minister, he served as member of the Jordanian Senate between 2016 and 2018 and also as Minister of Labour from 2010 to 2011.

Mr Murad has chaired and been a board member of countless companies and organizations, including the Jordanian branch of Education for Employment, the National Company for Employment and Training, and the Jordanian Social Security Investment Fund. He is also a member of the National Committee for Human Resources Development. He has served on the boards of various profit and non-profit organizations, such as INJAZ, which helps to prepare young Jordanians to become productive members of society and to succeed in a global economy, and is a co-founder of the Arab Foundation for Sustainable Development. Throughout his career, Mr Murad has worked tirelessly to promote youth development, education, employability and responsible citizenship.

For these reasons, the Government group believes that Mr Murad of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan has all the skills and experience necessary to successfully lead this 107th Session of the International Labour Conference and is honoured to nominate him as President.

(The proposal is supported by the Employers' and the Workers' groups.)

Mr Cortebeek

Chairperson of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office

The nomination put forward with the unanimous support of the Government group, by Ms Paik, has met with the agreement of the Employers' and Workers' groups.

Are there any other proposals?

In the absence of other proposals, I therefore have great pleasure in declaring Mr Samir Murad, Minister of Labour of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, President of the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I offer him my warmest congratulations, and invite him to come up to the podium to take the Chair.

Presidential address

The President

(Original Arabic)

First of all, I would like to thank the governments of the countries of the Asia and the Pacific region, which submitted Jordan's candidature for the presidency of this 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to thank the Government group for placing its trust in me. I am also thankful to the Employers' and Workers' groups for having supported my candidature. Jordan appreciates that trust, which crowns the excellent cooperation it has enjoyed with the whole world for the past 50 years.

It is a great honour for me to preside over this Conference and a singular honour for the country that I represent, the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, and its monarch, His Majesty King Abdullah II.

This 107th Session is not one like the others, as the ILO soon approaches its second century of existence. This provides us with an excellent opportunity to congratulate ourselves and all the Organization's Members, as well as its leaders, on this long journey in the service of the principles that the ILO espouses. We hope that the Organization will manage to realize its objectives of peace, social justice, gender equality and social protection, and that it will also be able to put in place a decent environment for all workers, regardless of their nationality, and ensure a transition from an informal to a formal economy.

We have before us the Report of the Director-General, The Women at Work initiative: The push for equality. It is a report that calls for the elimination of obstacles to equality and presents strategies for achieving that objective. It proposes new and innovative approaches for establishing real gender equality at work. In this report, my attention was drawn particularly to what the Director-General defines as a challenge, namely how to resolve the time–money–agency conundrum, the three constants that women around the world face and which have repercussions on their participation in the labour market.

We expect much from social dialogue between the tripartite constituents and from the negotiations and discussions among participants that will take place on the fringes of activities. We have no doubt that the Governments, Employers and Workers will present us with the new ideas needed to boost the ILO's efforts to promote gender equality on the eve of its centenary. When women's status improves, the world is a better place. That is why 193 States made the principle of gender equality a key component of the recently adopted 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. The 17 Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) entail targets for achieving male–female equality. In particular, SDG 5 clearly states: "Achieve gender equality and empower all women and girls". It is high time to take the necessary action to achieve that goal.

Cultural traditions and economic circumstances cannot justify discrimination or any other violation of basic human rights. Rich and poor countries alike must harness their social and economic potential to achieve the objective of gender equality. We need to implement ambitious policies that can remedy the disparities between men and women and bring about the necessary changes in social and professional relationships.

It is clear from the Appendix to the Report of the Director-General, The situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, that the situation has deteriorated for the workers of these territories. I would like to thank the Director-General for his visit last April to the Occupied Palestinian Territory and Israel. He went to see for himself what is happening. I agree with his remarks, in the preface of the Appendix to the Report, that "only dialogue and a joint search for solutions will effectively bring about decent work to the occupied Arab territories. The ILO and the international community as a whole have to remain fully engaged in this effort and faithful to their commitments."

Our Organization is nearly 100 years old. It was created to achieve social justice and to contribute to the establishment of peace. It is also endowed with unique features that it is vital to protect and strengthen. I am referring, of course, to the tripartism and standards activities that form the backbone of the ILO. That is the crucial challenge for our Organization and for its constitutional commitments.

I have no doubt that the tripartite constituents will continue their efforts in the coming months and years. The general discussion on effective development cooperation in support of the SDGs, which is on our agenda, will doubtless be an opportunity to exchange opinions and advice concerning the new medium-term development cooperation strategy that the ILO will apply from 2018, and to sketch out a future ILO vision for development cooperation, which is integral to the future of work.

We must fight violence and harassment. That is among the fundamental objectives of this Organization, as clearly stated in the Declaration of Philadelphia. During this session of the Conference, we shall focus on tackling the subject of violence and harassment at work against both women and men, with a view to establishing the standards needed to put an end to such abuse.

Despite the great efforts that have been made, there are still unacceptable forms of conduct and behaviour that persist, which requires us to put an end to acts that cause harm or physical, mental or sexual suffering for millions of workers and employers.

I would like to emphasize the importance of the benefits that we, the ILO constituents, are reaping following the reforms made to the ILO's administration, procedures and working methods. Improvements have clearly been made to the work of the Governing Body. In particular, the Governing Body enjoys better governance and greater levels of participation and commitment by all its members. I would also like to mention the reforms that have taken place to the work of the Conference over the past four years, and even at this session. We now have shorter Conference sessions and costs have gone down, while the quality of debates of this international parliament for labour matters is still excellent and has not been affected. I am aware that this reduced duration places pressure on us all, but I am convinced that, thanks to the past and present cooperation of all delegates, we shall carry out our task efficiently.

Despite the increasing demands made on the ILO – which remains on a zero-growth budget – we note a qualitative and quantitative increase in the services it provides to constituents, thanks to an internal reform process which has enabled the transfer of resources from administrative and support functions to direct service provision where there is pressing need.

We are on the eve of the ILO's second century of existence and, thanks to the clear-sighted leadership of our Director-General, Guy Ryder, we aim to continue building on our achievements towards a better future. We have to be proud of what has been accomplished in governance and leadership.

In conclusion, I would like to renew my thanks to the tripartite constituents for the trust they placed in me in electing me to lead this Conference. It is an honour both for myself and for the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. I will spare no effort and work unstintingly to remain worthy of your trust. We have a full agenda, and I am sure that, with the support provided by the Vice-Presidents and with your assistance, we shall be able to carry out the work of this session, both in plenary and in the committees.

Thank you very much for your attention.

Election of the Vice-Presidents of the Conference

The President

Our first task is the election of the Vice-Presidents of the Conference. The Clerk of the Conference, Ms Dimitrova, will read out the names of the candidates proposed by the various groups.

Ms Dimitrova

The Clerk of the Conference

The nominations for the three positions of Vice-President of the Conference are as follows: for the Government group, Mr Elmiger (Switzerland); for the Employers' group, Mr Mattar (United Arab Emirates); and for the Workers' group, Ms Gono (Japan).

The President

If there are no objections, may I take it that these proposals are approved?

(The proposals are approved.)

Nomination of the Officers of the groups

The President

We now move to the nominations of the Officers of the Government, Employers' and Workers' groups. The groups are, of course, autonomous in their choices and the names of those concerned are displayed on the screen, as indicated below:

Government group

Chairperson Ms Paik (Republic of Korea)

Vice-Chairperson Mr Sadiqov (Azerbaijan)

Employers' group

Chairperson Mr Mdwaba (South Africa)

Vice-Chairpersons Ms Rigg Herzog (United States)

Mr Megateli (Algeria)

Mr Matsui (Japan)

Mr Echavarría Saldarriaga (Colombia)

Ms Hornung-Draus (Germany)

Secretary Mr Suárez Santos (International Organisation of Employers)

Workers' group

Vice-Chairpersons Mr Wabba (Nigeria)

Mr Shmakov (Russian Federation)

Mr Awan (Pakistan)

Ms Moore (Barbados)

Secretary Ms González (International Trade Union Confederation)

Constitution and composition of the Conference committees

The President

The next agenda item concerns the constitution and composition of the standing committees and committees to consider items on the agenda of the Conference. The Conference may wish to establish the following committees: the Finance Committee; the Selection Committee; the Credentials Committee; the Committee on the Application of Standards; the Standard Setting Committee: violence and harassment in the world of work; the General Discussion Committee: effective ILO development cooperation; and the Recurrent Discussion Committee: social dialogue and tripartism.

The composition of the Committees, as proposed by the groups, was communicated to participants on the Conference website as Provisional Record No. 2.

The Finance Committee of Government Representatives is composed, as its name suggests, of all Government delegates to the Conference. There is no need to register for this Committee.

If there are no objections, may I take it that the Conference approves these proposals?

(The proposals are approved.)

Suspension of certain provisions of the Standing Orders of the Conference and other proposed decisions regarding formalities

The President

The next agenda item concerns the suspension of certain provisions of the Standing Orders of the Conference and other proposed decisions regarding formalities.

The purpose of their suspension is to implement at this session, pending amendment of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the various changes in the format of the Conference that are proposed in order to improve its functioning and, in particular, to accommodate its shortened length. Some of the suspensions relate to the work in plenary and others to the work in the committees.

Moreover, at its 332nd Session (March 2018), the Governing Body discussed proposals to approve, at the opening sitting of the Conference, all of the formalities necessary to set the Conference in motion, including some of the formalities dealt with in the past by the Selection Committee. These formalities include setting the closing date for the registration of speakers in plenary, approving the tentative plan of work for the Conference, adopting a number of suggestions to facilitate the work of the Conference and its committees, and authorizing the invitation of international non-governmental organizations to participate in committees.

These proposals are set forth in Provisional Record No. 1A, which has been published on the Web and is also available at the distribution desk.

If there are no objections, may I take it that the Conference wishes to suspend the various provisions of its Standing Orders for the purposes set out in Provisional Record No. 1A?

If there are no objections, may I also take it that the Conference endorses the procedural formalities set out in the second part of Provisional Record No. 1A?

(The proposals are approved.)

Delegation of authority to the Officers of the Conference

The President

We shall now take up the question of the delegation of authority to the Officers of the Conference. As per the agenda, the Conference will not meet again in plenary until Thursday, 31 May. I therefore propose that the daily organizational tasks of the Conference during the intervening period be carried out by its Officers.

If there are no objections, may I take it that the delegation of authority is acceptable to the Conference?

(The delegation of authority is accepted.)

Presentation of the Report of the Director-General

The President

We have now completed the necessary administrative and procedural tasks and can turn to questions of substance.

It is therefore my honour to call on the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr Ryder, to present his vision of the work to be accomplished at this session of the Conference together with his Report entitled The Women at Work initiative: The push for equality, and its Appendix on The situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. The Director-General will also present his report entitled ILO programme implementation 2016–17.

Mr Ryder

Secretary-General of the Conference

Let me begin by welcoming you all. This is a Conference with a great deal of work ahead of it, and it is encouraging indeed that one very good decision has already been made with the election of Mr Murad to lead us. It is not the first time that Jordan has given us our Conference President and so we know that we are in the very best of hands.

We meet just months away from the ILO's Centenary, and in circumstances that remain challenging for many in the world of work. There have been encouraging improvements in growth and employment for some of our member States, but still not enough to put us on a trajectory to achieve the goals of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, including decent work for all.

Nor are we having a serious impact on the inequalities – of income, of opportunity and of life quality – that continue to scar our societies, to make them unstable as well as unfair, and to complicate as well the relationship between countries. And the fact that these inequalities have their roots above all in what takes place in labour markets should, I think, remind everybody here of our collective responsibilities.

Two tendencies, related to these circumstances of heightened tension in the world, both of them worrying, merit the attention of this Conference, not least because they bear directly on issues which are on our agenda and which have a permanent impact on the life of our Organization.

Firstly, and very simply, it is becoming harder for us to talk to each other; harder to listen to each other; and harder to weigh the merits of the views of the other against one's own and in so doing reach for compromise and agreement. Now, I think that this is true in many areas, but most particularly – and pertinently for us – in that of the world of work. Certainly we have felt this at the ILO.

I have made it a point in my interventions from this platform in recent years to urge all delegates to adopt a spirit of tripartism, compromise and consensus, and I do so with particular insistence this time because it is a precondition for the success of this Conference and of the ILO. It means of course defending diverging positions and interests, but as partners not as adversaries: partnership made possible by the shared values and objectives of a whole century.

I say this with a feeling of some foreboding that there is a new climate abroad in the world. A new brutalism. It is to be found in the appalling suffering inflicted in so many conflicts in the world. It is to be found in the collective failure of too many to come to the aid of those most in need – those millions who are on the move, for example. It is to be found in the flouting of human rights standards with impunity, and in the questioning of some basic tenets of democratic life. I believe that our Organization and our Conference must be a bulwark against such contagion, through our own conduct and through the results that we achieve together.

It is therefore appropriate that social dialogue is the theme of the recurrent discussion on this year's agenda. Some might think that the ILO has already said just about everything that it is possible to say about social dialogue, but I do not take that view because, for the reasons explained, we need to do more and we need to do better to identify the obstacles that we are encountering and the implications of the multiple transformations in the world of work for the future of tripartism. We need to make the links between social dialogue and all other ILO strategic objectives, and most particularly the interaction between dialogue and collective bargaining, recognizing that it can make no sense to embrace one while turning away from the other.

The second tendency that I observe is the growing challenge to international cooperation through multilateralism. Objections to multilateralism seem to have become a theme tune in the background music of our time: that multilateralism is ineffective and cannot deliver; that it is an unwarranted infringement of national sovereignty; and that it is the instrument wielded by a cosmopolitan elite, and for its benefit alone.

The necessary response to this is the demonstration of a functioning and productive international system, one which engages all, and one which leaves nobody behind. And that is precisely the course being charted by the Secretary-General of the United Nations in the process of the UN reform, to which the ILO is contributing with energy and with conviction. We were pleased to have the opportunity to welcome the Deputy Secretary-General of the United Nations, Ms Amina Mohammed, to the Governing Body session in March and to exchange ideas with her on what the ILO can bring to the reform, and what reform can bring for the ILO. We know that the General Assembly will very soon adopt a resolution on reform of the UN development system, and it is all of this that provides the backdrop to our Conference debate on effective development cooperation in support of the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs). While this is a subject to which the Conference returns periodically, the situation today – of a multilateral system undergoing both pressure and change, now three years into the task of delivering the 2030 Agenda – I think places the stakes of this year's discussion particularly high.

The ILO has major responsibilities in delivering on the 2030 Agenda as a whole and also for the 14 SDG indicators for which it has been designated custodian. Meeting those responsibilities necessarily includes coming together in the definition of all of those indicators.

The occasions when the Conference embarks on the process of negotiating entirely new labour standards, particularly in the form of a possible Convention and Recommendation, have become increasingly infrequent in recent years. This, and the pressing importance of the subject itself – violence and harassment at work – combine to underline the undoubted significance of the task that we now begin and will hopefully complete at next year's centenary session of the Conference. The Governing Body decided on this agenda item in 2015 and it could not then have anticipated the upsurge of public revulsion in recent months through the #MeToo campaign, and much else, at well-publicized and high-profile cases of sexual harassment and abuse, by which, lamentably, the international system has not been left untouched. And so, we are confronted today with evidence of a submerged iceberg of misconduct, which disfigures and contaminates the world of work and renders it all too frequently a particularly hostile and intimidating environment for women.

It is tempting to conclude that this year's negotiations and those of next year are timely, but the truth is that they are long overdue. We cannot change that, but we can all join in making sure that we produce results that really make a difference and open the way to guarantees of workplaces entirely free of violence and harassment – and that means, by the way, that the scope of our work must encompass all forms of violence and harassment. Simply put, our answer to the ever more vocal call for this action has to be #UsToo.

And it goes without saying that here at the Conference we will and must conduct our own work with the highest levels of ethical standards and respect for all. The ILO itself is acting vigorously to ensure that “Zero tolerance” of harassment in our own Organization is not merely a slogan but a reality backed up by rights and effective mechanisms of protection.

With this in mind, I have also felt it right to devote my own Report to the Conference, which will be discussed here in plenary, to what I have termed the new push for gender equality. This forms a part of our Women at Work initiative and shares its basic premise. That premise is that, while the ILO has a considerable record of commitment and achievement in the cause of gender equality, the fact remains that we remain far from the goals that we have set ourselves and that progress towards those goals remains slow, uneven and uncertain.

So it seems that just carrying on doing the same things, or even doing a bit more of them is unlikely to overcome the sometimes hidden structural obstacles that need to be cleared from the path of equality. My Report suggests some avenues of innovative action which could help to do that and I encourage you as well, our tripartite constituents, to define and to join in a new push for equality on the occasion of the ILO Centenary.

Let me recall that an Appendix to my Report is – as has been the practice for nearly 40 years now – dedicated to the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. Like everybody in this hall, let me say that I look forward to the day when this Report will no longer be considered necessary. But, pending that and in line with past practice, I have fielded a mission to the territories to prepare the Report and I myself visited the Occupied Palestinian Territory and Israel last month.

Once more, there is little positive to report on the labour situation, and much cause for concern about humanitarian suffering, and the loss of life in Gaza in particular. But my visit confirmed my long-held conviction that there is much that the ILO can do – within its mandate and with the cooperation of the parties directly concerned – to bring real improvement in the harsh realities that working people continue to face in the territories. I want to urge you all to support us in those efforts.

Let me conclude my remarks on the Conference agenda with a reference to the Committee on the Application of Standards, that essential and permanent vertebral column of each and every Conference session and of the ILO's entire supervisory system. Let me say that it has been encouraging that this key Committee has been able to complete its work successfully at the last three Conference sessions, following the serious difficulties encountered in preceding years, despite still unresolved divergences of opinion on matters of fundamental significance, and because of the important efforts made by the different groups to find common ground.

It has however, been one of the frustrations, a shared frustration I believe, of the Governing Body's work over the past year that it has not been possible to advance substantively, and certainly not as we would have liked, the part of the Standards Initiative that addresses the reform of the supervisory system, even when real progress has been made in respect of the Standards Review Mechanism.

Nevertheless, I am confident that we will be able to move forward in the Governing Body in the coming year so that we get to the centenary session of the Conference with significant results to show. This is within reach. Of course, another productive session of the Committee on the Application of Standards this year will certainly do a lot to set us on that road.

In this context, let me underline the particular importance of the General Survey concerning working-time instruments that the Experts have presented to the Committee – not least in the context of the future of work. This was the very first subject of ILO standards setting and it has lost none of its significance and relevance over the last 100 years.

Our Conference will be honoured by the participation of Nobel Laureate, President Santos of Colombia, who will address us here on Friday, 1 June, and also by the participation of President Touadéra of the Central African Republic, President Higgins of Ireland and Prime Minister al-Abadi of the Republic of Iraq, who will be with us on Thursday, 7 June for the World of Work Summit, the theme of which this year is employment and decent work for peace and resilience. On that same day, we will mark the 20th anniversary of the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, and I think you would agree with me that this will provide a fitting climax as our Conference session draws close to its end.

Every Conference session is important. The agenda I have outlined to you this morning means, certainly, that this year's is no exception. Without detracting in any way at all from its significance, I need, nevertheless, to close by reminding you that next year we have a collective rendezvous with history at the centenary session of the Conference, a veritable landmark, not only for the ILO, but in the history of the system of international cooperation, of which this Conference is the founding stone.

As delegates will certainly be aware, seven centenary initiatives have been launched to mark this historic moment, and central among them is the Future of Work initiative, which will culminate at next year's centenary session of the Conference.

In preparation for that, our Global Commission on the Future of Work, co-chaired now by President Ramaphosa of South Africa and Prime Minister Löfven of Sweden, will publish a report at the beginning of next year which will be transmitted to the centenary session of the Conference, where deliberation will be critically important for the future direction of this – our – Organization. Because the future of work means also the future of the ILO.

That is for the future. Returning to the present, let me wish this session, all of you here, all members of this unique world parliament of labour, success in your work over the next two weeks.

The President

Thank you very much, Director-General, for giving us a clear overview of the work before us and for the presentation of your Report. The three groups will be guided over the next two weeks by the highly pertinent and timely perspective that you have put forward.

Presentation of the report of the Chairperson of the Governing Body

The President

It is now my honour to call on the Chairperson of the Governing Body for 2017–18, Mr Cortebeek, to present his report on the activities of the Governing Body for the period of his tenure. Mr Cortebeek's report is presented as Report I(C).

Mr Cortebeek

Chairperson of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office

Let me begin by saying that it has been a great honour and privilege to serve as Chairperson of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office for this last year. It is now my pleasure to present to you my report on the work of this august body over that 12-month period. The report that I have produced can be found under the reference Conference Report I(C).

As you know, together with the Report of the Director-General, this report is one of the subjects for discussion by the plenary of this session. The report speaks for itself in so far as it contains a very detailed account of the subjects examined by the Governing Body at the three sessions concerned: the short 330th Session, held last June, and the two substantial sessions, the 331st, held in October–November 2017, and the 332nd, held in March 2018.

I will therefore not repeat the contents of the report but will limit myself to a few additional comments that will, I hope, give a flavour of the matters that were considered and how the work was conducted. And here, as I cannot do so in the report, I would like to pay tribute to the three groups of the Governing Body for the commitment they showed to the tasks before them. A number of the subjects that were examined this past year proved to be both interesting and challenging. This, in my view, was due to three factors: the nature of the subjects at hand, the new composition of the Governing Body following the elections last June, and the evolving dynamics between and within the groups.

Some of you will also recall that back in June 2017, the Governing Body was called upon to take a decision on the holding of the Tenth European Regional Meeting. This came as a result of the Workers' group's request to postpone the Regional Meeting or change its venue. More recently, in March 2018, the 332nd Session of the Governing Body was brought to an abrupt end after the ILO Staff Union Committee called for strike action on the last day of the session. This was a consequence of the decision regarding the take-home pay reduction for Geneva-based ILO staff, resulting from a decision taken by the International Civil Service Commission. The strike action meant that a number of complex discussions were left unfinished.

The issue of promoting decent work in the tobacco sector is an excellent case in point. This is a particularly sensitive subject because, while presenting well-acknowledged public health implications, it also raises concerns about the protection of workers in this sector, including the eradication of child labour, and the role of the ILO. I am confident that the Governing Body is close to reaching a consensus on this agenda item which, it is my hope, will be satisfactory to all three groups.

Some might interpret these types of challenges as a hindrance to the proper functioning of the Governing Body, but I prefer to see them as testimony to the proper functioning of social dialogue, which sometimes includes industrial action, including within the confines of our Organization.

Despite this feeling of “unfinished business” at the end of our last session, the Governing Body has had a number of remarkable achievements this past year, of which it can and should be proud. In its governance role, the Governing Body made significant progress in setting the agenda of next year’s centenary session of the Conference, which will be a historic event for the Organization and the people it serves. At its centenary session, the Conference can look forward to receiving the report of the Global Commission on the Future of Work. The Global Commission marks the second stage in the ILO’s Future of Work initiative and its report will provide a foundation for the tripartite constituents to shape the future of work and decide on the future focus of the ILO. The Commission has been extremely productive and I would like to invite you all to attend the information session regarding its work, which will be held on Wednesday, 30 May, from 1 p.m. to 2.30 p.m. in room XVI, here at the Palais des Nations.

The Governing Body also continued its review and ongoing improvement of the functioning of the International Labour Conference in its two-week format and made progress with its review of the Regional Meetings. The Governing Body has accordingly submitted the consolidated version of the Rules for Regional Meetings, which it adopted in March, to the Conference for confirmation. Likewise, we hope that the next session of the Governing Body will be able to come to a decision on the review and format of expert and technical meetings.

Another achievement has been the slow but steady progress in consensus-building with regard to the strengthening of the supervisory system, one of the cornerstones of this Organization. The Governing Body is very close to reaching much-needed agreement on this item, which will prove essential to the proper functioning of the Organization’s supervisory system as it enters its second century of existence.

While on the subject of the supervisory system, I would like to take a moment to reflect on the developments surrounding the complaints made under article 26 of the ILO Constitution and the representations made under article 24 that were on our agenda over the past year. The Governing Body tackled these issues with the explicit aim of securing the sustainable and long-lasting application of the ratified Conventions concerned. In doing so, it has proven that, as observed by Director-General Ryder, through a combination of principle and perseverance in the treatment of such complaints, significant results can be obtained. Here, I am referring to the case of Qatar, which the Governing Body decided to close last November. This particular case serves to highlight the strength of the process, starting with the Governing Body’s decision, in 2015, that a tripartite high-level mission to the country should take place. This was followed by lengthy negotiations with a view to securing full respect for one of the Organization’s fundamental principles, the elimination of forced labour, and the relevant Conventions. Today, we have a comprehensive ILO technical cooperation programme in place in Qatar and an ILO presence aimed at improving the employment and working conditions of migrant workers in the country with the collaboration of the Government and representatives of these vulnerable workers.

In other instances, as was the case with Guatemala and the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, the Governing Body had to make use of all the procedures at its disposal, entirely in consonance with the mandate of our Organization, in the hope that positive change would be brought about in the near future. The Governing Body will need to continue to address these cases objectively and dispassionately at its upcoming sessions.

You can see from the use of such procedures that the Governing Body has fully played its role in the supervisory system as well. Still on the Governing Body’s role in the ILO’s supervisory system, I would like to pay tribute to the work of its Committee on Freedom of Association and, in particular, welcome the update of the Digest of its decisions and the production of its first annual report.

Although perhaps less visible, I would also like to mention two other aspects of the work of the ILO that are a testimony to our collective effort to ensure the relevance and adaptation of our body of international standards. Here, I am thinking in particular of the outcome of the work of the Standards Review Mechanism and of the Special Tripartite Committee under the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, which we have at this session of the Conference in the form of a number of proposals to derogate from and withdraw obsolete international labour instruments, and of draft amendments to the Maritime Labour Convention.

Likewise, the Governing Body has served its role in positioning the Organization in the multilateral system and working towards achievement of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. Last March, its voice was heard loud and clear in the presence of the Deputy Secretary-General of the United Nations, Ms Amina Mohammed, during the High-Level Session on the Reform of the United Nations. At that session, the ILO constituents conveyed a clear message to the Deputy Secretary-General on how the UN reform process could best take into account the specific tripartite and standard-setting nature of the ILO and its activities. Through these many steps, the ILO has clearly established itself as a relevant actor in the 2030 Agenda and in the UN system. The Organization's goal is to actively participate in driving the success of the ongoing UN reform while maintaining sufficient independence for its tripartite nature, supervisory mechanisms and standard-setting activities – which we hold so dear – to continue to speak with a loud and clear voice on issues we consider critical.

My report shows that the Governing Body has tackled complex and difficult issues and that it has done so with great zest. For this, I am grateful to my fellow Officers, Mr de la Puente Ribeyro and Mr Mdwaba. I would also like to extend my gratitude to Ms Passchier for her coordination of the Workers' group. Many thanks to all three. During my many years of service as an Officer of the Governing Body, it has become immensely apparent to me how important it is that while the Officers of the Governing Body represent their respective groups, they have a collective responsibility for the work of the ILO itself. This collective responsibility can only be met by working collegially in the best interests of the Organization and its constituents.

Last, but not least, I want to thank the Director-General, the three Deputy Directors-General, the Directors and their teams – and especially the Official Meetings, Documentation and Relations Department (RELMEETINGS) – for their support. I want to express my deepest respect and gratitude for the high value of the work of the management and staff of the International Labour Office.

The Governing Body has now dissolved into the Conference of our Organization. As my mandate as Chairperson of the Governing Body draws to a close, it is my sincere hope that the spirit of dialogue and consensus which we all hope to see in our work over the next two weeks will carry over into the Governing Body at its 333rd Session, which will begin on the Saturday following the closure of this session of our Conference.

With these words, I submit my report on the work of the Governing Body for the year 2017–18 to the Conference.

The President

Thank you, Mr Cortebeek, for your presentation. As your report shows, the Governing Body was faced with many difficult and serious issues, and I can very much appreciate the hard work that all members put into achieving tripartite consensus when seeking the way forward.

I should like to congratulate you, on behalf of the Conference, on your successful guidance of the debates in the Governing Body over the past year, and my congratulations are also extended to your close colleagues, the Government and Employer Vice-Chairpersons, and to the Governing Body members as a whole.

You have our gratitude, Mr Cortebeek.

Opening statements by the Chairpersons of the Employers' and Workers' groups of the Conference

The President

We now move on to the next item, which is the opening statements by the Chairpersons of the Employers' and Workers' groups of the Conference, in which they will put forward their groups' views on the work that the Conference has before it.

Mr Mdwaba

Employer (South Africa), Chairperson of the Employers' group

Allow me to begin by congratulating His Excellency, Mr Murad, Minister of Labour of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, on his election as President of this 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. On behalf of the Employers' group, I wish him the very best for the task ahead. Let me take this opportunity to greet everybody by saying "jambo", which means "hello and greetings" in my continent.

I want to restate what should be obvious, particularly at the beginning of our work, namely that the International Labour Conference brings together the best of tripartism, gathering employers, workers and governments from all around the world. This permeates all that we do. Currently, that social dialogue is being questioned by some, or else forgotten by others through their actions or inaction.

I need to remind everyone of the important strength that Conference outcomes acquire when they enjoy the widest tripartite support, because they often have an impact on the ground. The Employers' group has been clear on the need to ensure that the Conference maintains its relevance in today's world. Some question the Conference's relevance, and we cannot afford this given the critical role that it can and must play going forward as we work together for a sustainable world. There is a huge challenge before the Centenary of the ILO to prove that we are up to the high expectations of people throughout the world, whether in developing or developed countries and regions, in the formal or informal sector, or among women and men of all persuasions, young people, the employed and, more importantly, the unemployed, as well as those whose rights are trampled on or ignored.

The two-week format is already consolidated and, despite all the difficulties, has served to reinforce our efficiency. We still have some way to go yet, but we are on the right track.

I will turn briefly to the items on this session's agenda. The Committee on the Application of Standards is the supervisory committee of the Conference and the Conference is the supreme decision-making body of the ILO. Its conclusions and recommendations carry weight, as they provide valuable guidance from the highest levels on the implementation of ILO standards. Its views can be different from those of other bodies such as the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

We have managed to achieve greater ownership of its results, improvements in the drafting of conclusions and more clarity on what the areas of consensus are, as well as greater freedom for constituents to express and reflect their different views and major achievements.

Agreeing to disagree is an intrinsic part of tripartism. Our expression of our strong views should not and should never be misconstrued as anything other than ensuring that governance is adhered to at all times and that, in so doing, our values and principles and relevance are never lost. Good time management in the Committee on the Application of Standards is becoming an example for other committees. It is very important to note that the Employers' and Workers' groups have also acted with a sense of commitment and responsibility by ensuring timely agreement on the list of cases.

As we mentioned last year, and wish to reiterate with great intensity and insistence this year, improvements towards the better running of this crucial committee cannot be viewed in an isolated manner. It is intrinsically linked to the functioning of the overall ILO standards supervisory system. The Employers are starting to see some important positive outputs from the ILO's Standards Initiative and we continue to expect a high degree of responsibility from all constituents in order to achieve tangible results. The General Survey submitted to the Committee on the Application of Standards this year is especially relevant, as it will deal with one of the most relevant topics vis-à-vis the new realities of work and working time. We hope that the Committee helps to anticipate this debate in a positive manner as an opportunity to improve working conditions rather than be seen as a threat; that will make this a better house for us all.

The general discussion on effective development cooperation was a proposal that the Employers put forward and supported together with other constituents. As already stated, the ILO needs to make its actions and role relevant and credible and their impact fruitful. The key challenge before us is to ensure that initiatives and actions undertaken by other actors in the UN system take into consideration the Decent Work Agenda and its ownership by social partners, especially before we travel in the direction envisaged in the UN reform proposals. An approach to development cooperation that responds to constituents' needs and actively seeks out their views and priorities before final agreement or projects is therefore a sine qua non of our working methods. We are looking forward to a practical discussion grounded in pragmatism and realism. To achieve this, we need to build on the systematic evaluation of development cooperation on the ground. This is not always the case. We cannot grasp lessons learned about what works and what does not if we do not use the information provided in the findings of high-level evaluations as a learning tool.

International labour standards remain at the core of the ILO's mandate. However, they should not be the only lens through which we view development cooperation. We also need to strengthen and prioritize our action on employment promotion and social dialogue to provide further tangible results. Simply put, the notion that having a standard means that the problem is solved is flawed thinking; we need a much more holistic approach. By sourcing innovative financing mechanisms and fostering partnerships mainly through wider private sector contributions, public-private partnerships will also help enormously to achieve the SDGs. Here, we are specifically concerned about the failure to recognize the role of independent employers' organizations as the proper channel to coordinate the voice of business and as an essential tool for forging partnerships with the private sector rather than with UN units and with bodies or broad networks that are neither representative nor independent.

The recurrent discussion this year on social dialogue that my colleagues have already mentioned is a particularly important one. We may not be aware of how threatened social dialogue is as we find ourselves on the eve of celebrating our Centenary. Tripartism and social dialogue are the main assets of the ILO. Without them, we lose not only our uniqueness but our identity, our values and our relevance. We need to prove that they make an essential contribution to the entire UN system. For this to happen, we should not lose the practical aspect of our recurrent discussions, namely to better understand the diverse realities and needs of its members with respect to each of the ILO's strategic objectives. It will be a waste of time if we do not resist theoretical and ideological debate conducted for its own sake. Ideologism is a huge threat that we must resist. At this moment, I turn to Albert Einstein, who said: "The world as we have created it is a process of our thinking. It cannot be changed without changing our thinking". And to Tuli Kupferberg, who said: "When patterns are broken, new worlds emerge". And they always do. Diversity in social dialogue should be the primary basis for fruitful debate. There is no one-size-fits-all model of social dialogue, nor is there a specific superior model of collective agreement.

It is also important to understand that social dialogue is an instrument, not a panacea for social peace. The ILO is the home of social dialogue at the global level. It was created for this very purpose. We are therefore very concerned at the growth of other parallel initiatives which could only at best duplicate and at worst undermine the ILO's universal mandate and place in the multilateral system.

We are concerned that the ILO is diverting its own time and resources to promote initiatives such as the Global Deal partnership for decent work and inclusive growth. This detracts from its own work, against the wishes of one of the ILO's tripartite constituent groups. Moreover, by selecting an ad hoc source of business representation, it is causing great concern to Governing Body members.

Let me be clear, the Employers very strongly support social dialogue and the benefits it can bring, otherwise we would not be here. So let us work together in this house to achieve outcomes, and not subcontract elsewhere. We have a challenging first standard-setting discussion this year, on violence and harassment in the workplace. The Employers are strongly and responsibly committed to achieving the shared goal of effectively preventing violence and harassment in the workplace.

The conclusions arising from this discussion must lead to the formulation of a realistic and effective instrument. To do this, we call on all constituents to work jointly to avoid vague and subjective concepts – what in the past I have referred to as intellectually and ideologically indulgent expressions of a non-universal character. We should also avoid confusion between the responsibilities of employers and those of public authorities.

It is essential to find different approaches to combating violence and harassment, as they are two different entities, even though they are connected. The discussion will be difficult, but we do not want to be misunderstood. This is a workplace issue and we are committed to finding a way forward, within the ILO, which could provide genuine workplace solutions.

I will finish briefly by referring to the report submitted by the Director-General on the Women at Work initiative. We believe that the ILO must provide a more ambitious contribution to gender inclusion. This is not just the right thing to do, it is a powerful step towards improving productivity in the hypocritical world we live in, where there are different standards for men and women. It is unfortunate that the report comes across as rather negative, when in fact there has been progress. A huge number of women are now better positioned in the labour market, thanks to efforts by employers who invest in fair recruitment, compensation and promotion policies, flexible working-time schemes and other work-related actions. Do we still need to improve? Absolutely, we have to. We need huge improvement, for example, in the areas of non-discriminatory wage policies and the manner in which women are discriminated against in ways that are sometimes difficult to quantify as they are often the result of unconscious bias. A merely legalistic approach which just eases burdens and shifts responsibility onto companies would prove to be counterproductive and irresponsible. Public authorities need to design a policy mix which supports these efforts. The International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the Employers' group, together with our colleagues in the ILO's Bureau for Employers' Activities (ACT/EMP), are working on this issue, firstly to track progress but also to provide tools and good practices for our corporate members who are looking for help and advice on how to move ahead in this area. This includes looking at the governance structures in our own organizations too, as they are only effective if they are a mirror of the societies we seek to serve. We will continue working to make the business case more evident and impactful.

At this stage I thank you for listening and I wish you well in all your deliberations. Thank you very much.

Ms Passchier

Worker (Netherlands), Chairperson
of the Workers' group

Let me first congratulate the President and the three Vice-Presidents on their election. They have an important task before them and we will all support them. Secondly, let me say that it is a privilege for me to represent at this Conference the voice of the workers of the world. This Organization is especially dear to workers because it may be the only place in the world where they have an equal place at the table with governments and employers. For almost 100 years now, this house has functioned as a lighthouse, a beacon in sometimes-dark times, to which workers and unions in dire situations look for guidance and support, and which shows the rest of the world that social dialogue is the key to achieving social justice. We must ensure that it continues to do so in the next century.

The ILO is a reflection of the real world out there. It is therefore easy to find points of disagreement and discontent. The challenge, however, is to find jointly a way forward that helps to implement labour rights and build social justice.

The issues that we will be addressing during this session of the Conference are of profound importance to working men and women around the world, and to their economies and societies. The ILO, in the run-up to its centenary, must show its vitality and relevance by dealing with them with tripartite commitment and determination.

At the beginning of this Conference, I wish to touch on the items on our agenda and on some of the Workers' group's priorities.

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards has an essential constitutional task which makes the ILO unique in the United Nations system. In too many countries, the realization of decent work and social justice remains jeopardized by violations of labour rights, particularly those enshrined in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). In this Committee, serious issues are discussed, including the question of what to do to ensure more and better compliance. Its debates are therefore of crucial importance. They must show that ratification has to go hand in hand with a commitment by member States to give effect to the Conventions that they have ratified.

Violence and harassment in the world of work are, in our view, very closely connected and difficult to separate and constitute a serious human and labour rights violation. Both men and women can be affected: in a new and worrying trend in public and private services, not only ambulance drivers and teachers, but also retail workers and cleaners are being targeted by the general public. However, there is a strong gender dimension with women increasingly paying the price for their enhanced roles in the world of work and in society at large by being confronted with violence and harassment, including sexual harassment.

This impinges on the ability to exercise other fundamental labour rights and is incompatible with decent work. It poses a threat to the dignity, security, health and well-being of everyone. It has an impact not only on workers and employers, but also on their families, communities, economies and society as a whole.

It is in everybody's interest that it stop and this is increasingly recognized. This year, the members of the Committee have a unique opportunity to show the relevance of the ILO's standard-setting function by addressing an issue that has no place in the twenty-first century world of work. The Workers want to see an inclusive and effective Convention, supplemented by a Recommendation, that takes an integrated approach in addressing violence and harassment and protects all workers, regardless of sector and whether in the formal or the informal economy. We will work with all of the groups to ensure that this leads to standards that are ambitious as well as fit for purpose.

The recurrent discussion on social dialogue provides an opportunity to reaffirm the relevance of social dialogue, with freedom of association and collective bargaining as enabling rights that promote social justice and decent work. This discussion is timely; inequality is at historic levels and the share of wages as a percentage of GDP has declined significantly in recent years. These trends have developed in a context of serious attacks on trade union rights, including labour market reforms that have undermined collective bargaining and the growth of precarious and non-standard forms of employment that have weakened the capacity of trade unions to organize and bargain collectively. Conventions Nos 87 and 98 remain the least ratified of the core Conventions, even though all of the constituents of this house have undertaken to achieve their universal ratification by 2019.

But even when these Conventions have been ratified, too many countries' laws and practices include serious obstacles to workers' efforts to organize and strive collectively for better wages, working conditions and decent work.

This year's discussion must create real political momentum ahead of the centenary celebrations and result in concrete action leading to universal ratification and implementation.

Let me remind you that the ILO has a constitutional obligation to promote collective bargaining. It should therefore also step up its policy advice and advocacy on the value of extending collective bargaining coverage in order to ensure more equal wages and decent working conditions. Based on this constitutional mandate, the ILO should proactively engage in all relevant discussions inside and outside the United Nations structures to promote its core values. The Global Deal partnership for decent work and inclusive growth is just one more important promotional tool available to the ILO, of which it should make good use.

The discussion should also contribute to the debate on the future of work by identifying strategies to ensure that workers in platform businesses can exercise their right to freedom of association and collective bargaining and access decent work. Also, in this era of globalization, it is of key importance to develop innovative and effective forms of social dialogue at all relevant levels, including the international level. This year's discussion should therefore recognize the important value of various forms of cross-border social dialogue and its potential to deal with the globalization of business, giving effect to the due diligence required from multinationals in the UN Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights and the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy (MNE Declaration).

Let me now turn to the general discussion on effective development cooperation in support of the SDGs. International development cooperation is undergoing profound changes marked by the new finance for development framework and the UN reform process.

The rights-based approach which lies at the heart of the 2030 Agenda offers a unique opportunity to enshrine the ILO's normative agenda in ILO development cooperation. Key in this regard is the need for the UN system to recognize the role of social dialogue in development cooperation. Decent Work Country Programmes (DWCPs) should be strategically used with a view to the effective involvement of social partners in implementing the four pillars of the ILO's Decent Work Agenda and the United Nations Development Assistance Framework (UNDAF).

The DWCPs should also be better used to promote ratification and implementation of international labour standards, taking into account the comments of the supervisory bodies.

Partnerships with business entities should be built on a solid monitoring and assessment framework that provides transparency, accountability and development results in accordance with ILO values and standards and involves workers' organizations. Partnerships with other organizations should fully respect the ILO's normative mandate and tripartite structure.

The ILO is the oldest United Nations agency; its existence predates that of the United Nations itself. We will celebrate its centenary next year, when we will discuss the role of the ILO in the future of work. The Workers' group wants to ensure that the actions taken with a view to strengthening the United Nations system will help to further strengthen, rather than weaken, the ILO's role and mandate. The ILO has a unique place in the United Nations structure that must be maintained and can provide inspiration and guidance throughout the United Nations system.

Let me conclude with a few remarks on the Report of the Director-General, The Women at Work initiative: The push for equality. We think that this is a very appropriate title, and we will contribute more extensively to its discussion later this week.

For now, I want to commend the Office for putting its finger on some sore spots when it comes to the persistent lack of progress in the area of gender equality and for demanding that all of us turn indignation into action, particularly at workplaces and in labour markets, and move beyond business as usual.

Let me also thank the Director-General for the Appendix to his Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. The occupation, now already 50 years on, continues to make the living and working conditions of Palestinians extremely difficult without real prospects for improvement. Unemployment has reached record levels with youth and women the hardest hit. Renewed efforts must be made in order to bring the occupation to an end with the establishment of an independent and viable Palestinian state living side by side with Israel in peace and security.

I am looking forward to debates that are intense and respectful, and let us be ambitious in the results that we achieve. I wish you and all of us a fruitful Conference.

The President

That brings us to the conclusion of the formal opening of the Conference and the establishment of the structure we need to accomplish our work over the next two weeks.

Principles governing the Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General

The President

It is my great pleasure to declare open the second sitting of the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference.

This morning, we shall begin the plenary discussion on the Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General. These reports were presented in plenary on Monday of this week.

Before starting the discussion, I should like to make a call on all those who will speak on these reports to do so with both the openness and the dignity that are appropriate to the highest international body in the realm of social and labour-related matters.

Freedom of expression is a vital feature of the International Labour Organization. To exercise this freedom in a spirit of mutual respect, it is essential that all delegates use parliamentary language, respect the accepted procedure, refer only to the items under discussion and avoid raising any questions foreign to these matters. This discipline is necessary if we want our work to be effective and successful.

Please note that the duration of speeches is limited by the Standing Orders of the Conference to five minutes only, corresponding to approximately three typewritten double-spaced pages. This time limit will be strictly applied. It is therefore strongly recommended that delegates reduce courtesies to a minimum.

The lectern is equipped with a timing device which allows speakers to see how much time they have left. With a view to transparency, and because respect for time-keeping is a collective responsibility, the timing display is also projected onto the two screens facing the plenary hall, so that delegates in the room are able to see the speaking times as well.

This will also enable delegates speaking further down the list to see how fast progress is being made and to prepare themselves for making their presentations.

I should point out that this strict time limit does not apply to the statements by the Employer and Worker spokespersons as they open the general debate with their group statements.

Every delegate will have the right of reply if he or she feels there is a need to respond in the event that his or her government, or the organization they represent, has been challenged. In such cases, delegates must inform the President of the sitting, before that sitting finishes, that they wish to exercise their right of reply. Please make such requests by coming up to the podium and informing the Clerk. The Clerk will transmit the request to the President, who will agree with the delegation concerned on a time at which the reply will be made.

The reply should refer only to the point under debate. It should not exceed two minutes, and it should be delivered in correct parliamentary language. Please keep in mind that it is not practice in our Organization to allow replies to replies.

If there is no objection, may I take it that these arrangements are agreeable to the Conference?

(It is so decided.)

The President

Without further ado, we shall now open the discussion on the Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Statements by the Chairpersons of the Employers' and Workers' groups of the Conference

Mr Mdwaba

Employer (South Africa), Chairperson of the Employers' group

I would like to thank the Director-General for preparing and submitting his Report, The Women at Work initiative: The push for equality. It is very comprehensive and is provoking great discussion among us all on the topic of gender equality. Overall, the Report paints a rather negative picture of women in the world of work and emphasizes the prevalence of unfairness at work and within social structures. We cannot deny the important challenges faced worldwide with regard to gender discrimination in society and in the workplace. As I stated in my opening address, there is no doubt that a lot still needs to be done to deal with double standards for men and women in the workplace, as well as hypocritical attitudes towards women by society as a whole. But due recognition of the considerable progress that has been achieved over the past decades as a result of national and international efforts, in particular in those countries that have approached this challenge as a societal one, is called for. Therefore we must guard against painting a generic negative picture of the situation.

While we always provide examples and corroboration of our positions as a group, there are those who feel that we do not make them crystal clear so here goes. According to the annual Report of the United Nations Entity for Gender Equality and the Empowerment of Women (UN Women) for the period 2016–17, “[a]round the world, empowered women are achieving visible progress”. This report cites various achievements which have resulted from 72 laws that have been adapted or amended to strengthen women’s rights in 61 countries. The World Economic Forum’s Global Gender Gap Report 2017 tracks the evolution of the Global Gender Gap Index since 2006 by geographic region. It highlights local progress towards gender parity over the past decade in regions such as Western Europe, South Asia, sub-Saharan Africa and Latin America and the Caribbean.

Although more work needs to be done, all of the world’s regions have recorded a narrower gender gap than the one observed 11 years ago. The World Bank has found that between 1990 and 2017, the percentage of women participating in the workforce increased in a considerable number of developing countries, such as Afghanistan, Azerbaijan, Bangladesh, Botswana, Chile, Djibouti, Gabon, the Gambia, Haiti, Iraq, Mali, Namibia, Pakistan and Senegal, as well as in the least developed countries, the sub-Saharan African countries and the low-income countries. In the developed countries, according to the

Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) Report on the Implementation of the OECD Gender Recommendations, women's labour force participation rates have moved closer to men's rates over the past few decades.

With regard to ILO interventions on gender equality, a considerable amount of constituent funding under the regular budget or specific development cooperation projects has been allocated to the promotion of gender inclusion over the past few decades. Rather than a general reference to a guide to best practices, we had hoped to see detailed information on success stories to inspire those who are not fully aware of the challenges faced by women and encourage them to make positive changes. Consultation with our Bureau for Employers' Activities (ACT/EMP) would have helped to ensure that these examples were included for balance, particularly in light of ACT/EMP's 2015 Global Report on Women in business and management: Gaining momentum, which highlights a number of company examples of good practice and ways in which employers' organizations are taking the initiative in their own governance structures. This Report will be updated for the ILO centenary next year as a demonstration of the importance that we attach to this matter.

Let me highlight a few important points. Employers globally are fully committed to women's continued progress as a critical talent pool. We fully agree with the Director-General on the need for a new push for equality. We must also emphasize payment parity as part of this push and include our youth in the process of ensuring that work in the future is characterized by changed attitudes that concomitantly contribute to a better world in this regard.

At yesterday's update on the work of the Global Commission on the Future of Work, I mentioned that this is a point that my daughter likes to stress with me all the time, so I have to put it in and make sure that she knows that we do bear these things in mind and we do listen. Those of you who also attended the briefing on the Global Commission are aware that we will be looking forward to the Commission's report for ideas on how we can craft a better future in this respect because that, too, should help us decide how to move forward.

The ILO must provide a much more ambitious contribution to gender inclusion. It is not just the right thing to do; it is also a powerful step towards improving productivity. A large number of women are now better positioned on the labour market thanks to businesses' efforts to invest in fair recruitment, compensation and promotion policies, adopt flexible working-time schemes and establish other internal human resources policies on matters such as care facilities.

Businesses are changing their approach to recruitment, promotion and workplace culture. These efforts also aim to improve women's access to top managerial positions. At the same time, employers' organizations are progressively prioritizing gender equality, offering services on women's entrepreneurship, working with public institutions and stakeholders to narrow the gender gap in education and training, and developing evidence-based approaches to and research on women in business and management.

The International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and ACT/EMP are working intensively in this area and, as a result, best practices are being shared and advocated among employers' organizations. I would also like to highlight that this is a shared responsibility: public institutions; the private sector, through employers' organizations; workers' organizations; communities; and other stakeholders all have a role to play. A collective effort to address a global challenge is needed. There are many ways to address this challenge, but one thing we are sure of is that a mere legal approach which just adds burdens and shifts responsibilities to companies has proved to be counterproductive.

Alongside legislation, public authorities need to design effective incentives and a policy mix that supports this effort. This is linked to the point made in the Report with regard to employers who shoulder maternity protection costs. Laws on this issue have made hiring a woman more costly than hiring a man. Again, we must find novel ways of doing things in order to effect change. It is imperative that we learn from what has not worked in the past and ensure a better future for our people.

At this juncture, I would not favour the use of the expression “non-standard forms of employment” as opposed to “standard employment”. This is no longer useful, because, among other things, it fails to acknowledge the key role of diverse forms of employment in promoting equal opportunity. It fails to acknowledge new methodologies associated with the world of work into which we have moved. Without, of course, pre-empting the future Report of the Global Commission on the Future of Work, this issue has been raised repeatedly by constituents and we must change in order to recognize it and not be stuck with the useless labels of the past.

In relation to the future of work, we would like to propose that the ILO conduct additional research and, of course, pay attention to the rich discussions that we are having in the Global Commission on the Future of Work on ways to assess how the digital economy is empowering women’s purchasing and decision-making power, enabling women and men to afford care services and, eventually, allowing women to transition to more formal workplaces.

In terms of ILO programme implementation for 2016–17, given the length of my intervention at the Governing Body’s March session, which was quite comprehensive, I would just like to highlight the main points for the next biennium report. We would like to see an improved analytical framework using appropriate measurement tools so that trends, changes and impact will have a stronger narrative. We would also like to see an improved financial analysis and clarity on how approved budgets are implemented. We are, of course, encouraged by the fact that our colleagues in the Office have taken in what we said and confirmed this in the discussions at the most recent meeting of the Finance Committee. We heard, only a few days ago, that they are making changes in order to reflect our concerns.

We appreciate the Appendix to the Report of the Director-General, entitled The situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, as well as the ILO delegation’s mission to the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, Gaza, Israel and the occupied Syrian Golan. We take note of the negative economic situation of Palestinian workers; unemployment is rising with an overall rate of 27.4 per cent and female unemployment at a staggering 47.4 per cent. In view of the decline in international aid in recent years, we call on the international community to increase financial support with much more ambition and determination. We encourage both the Israeli and Palestinian authorities to engage in effective dialogue through a concerted effort to achieve substantive improvement in the business environment that will be conducive to solid job growth. The Employers’ group would like to insist on the lifting of restrictions on economic activity in order to effectively enable businesses to operate and contribute to economic growth in the region.

As the Employers’ group has stated in the past year, the ILO should embark on large-scale technical assistance within the framework of the flagship programme on fragile States and disaster response. We should intensify our efforts to support the labour law reform processes through tripartite partnerships and consultations and provide technical support and advice on the skills development of Palestinian workers. The Employers’ group encourages the ILO to build the capacities of all constituents.

Ms Passchier

Worker (Netherlands), Chairperson
of the Workers' group

Today, we are discussing the Director-General's Report on the Women at Work initiative, whose title very appropriately refers to "the push for equality". Progress is at a snail's pace, and in many places we even see a backlash. So, we certainly need to do more and better if we do not want to have a similar discussion at the second centenary of this house.

There have been many advances for women in the world of work over the past century. The most visible change has been the feminization of the workforce in remunerated employment. Women's participation in the labour market has increased exponentially since the Second World War and now stands at around 50 per cent. Globally, many countries have implemented measures aimed at reducing or eliminating gender discrimination in the workplace.

The ILO has a long track record of addressing equality and non-discrimination and the rights and needs of women workers. However, women continue to lag behind in the world of work. This is not due to overall poorer qualifications or skills, as women are increasingly performing better than men. However, in many ways women's participation in the labour market is still seen as supplementary. Supplementary, that is, to their roles as spouses, mothers and carers.

Somehow, these roles, even for women who do not perform them in practice, determine our chances of a steady job and income, a career and a position of leadership, and ultimately a proper pension. This translates into occupational segregation and gender wage gaps that continue to persist in all regions, but also into violence against women and girls, both at home and in the workplace.

In recent times, matters have become worse, especially in the regions most affected by the economic crisis. Labour-market participation rates for women are now stagnating or declining. Certain policies introduced in recent years, particularly in Europe following the collapse of the world's financial markets, have challenged the robustness of gender equality policies.

Since 2009, we have seen an alarming rise in income inequalities. Women continue to predominate in informal work, and precarious, low-skilled and low-paid jobs with poor labour and social protection are on the rise again. Poverty continues to wear a female face and young women and migrant women are particularly affected.

We have seen an acceleration in the State's withdrawal from the provision of vital public services, and also from its role as an employer, including the care services on which women so heavily depend in order to access decent work. The promotion of equal sharing of family responsibilities, adequate maternity protection and equal pay appear to have taken a back seat in both public policies and macroeconomic policies.

Attacks on fundamental trade union rights have been part and parcel of the backward trend. In recent times, trade unions have managed to secure gender equality provisions in collective agreements and, by organizing themselves into unions and taking collective action, vulnerable groups of workers have tried to improve their situation. In many trade unions around the world, this has translated into increased female membership.

However, the fundamental rights of freedom of association and collective bargaining, including the right to strike, which are more and more being claimed and utilized by women workers and in female-dominated industries such as the garment sector and tourism, are coming under increasing pressure. Violence and harassment against women in the world of work remains a pressing challenge and a significant barrier to the realization of women's rights.

On this occasion, looking forward to the centenary of the ILO, we strongly support the message in the Director-General's Report that it is high time to go beyond "business as usual".

Indeed, we may have reached the limits of what we can do from a mere equality perspective. Until now this has too often resulted in declaring women equal to men and expecting them to compete in the world of work on male terms, without addressing the contradictions arising from this approach.

We must look into a more transformative approach that allows both women and men to develop all their talents and capacities and to take on multiple roles in life, as workers, parents and carers, and which demands that companies, public institutions and workplaces be more responsive to change and diversity.

It is not women that need to be "fixed", but the social and economic systems and institutions that shape our lives and the world of work.

This is not to say, as the report rightfully stresses, that the experiences and tools of the past should be jettisoned. Rather, they need to be complemented by new and innovative approaches. To achieve this, the Director-General suggests five building blocks, and let me briefly touch on each of them.

But before doing so, let me emphasize that all these building blocks are interrelated, such that only by addressing them all at the same time in a proactive and integrated manner will we bring about the necessary progress.

The first one is: A high road to a new care economy. At the heart of much of the inequality faced by women lie constraints revolving around care responsibilities and women's reproductive roles. Assumptions about women's roles and place in society profoundly affect how women participate in the workforce, including the type of work they do, the positions they hold, the quality of their jobs, their career opportunities and their wages.

The need to juggle caring responsibilities with income-generating activities, combined with the lack of appropriate frameworks or facilities to support and reconcile work and care, often leads women into low quality part-time work or casual or informal work arrangements.

Without tackling this dominant care paradigm or, as the report puts it "the time-money-agency conundrum", we will not make the necessary progress towards a more just and gender-equitable world of work.

The Workers' group agrees with the report's conclusion that a new care economy, grounded in decent work, can contribute significantly in the push for equality. While much of the focus of the future of work is placed on the impact of rapidly evolving technologies, the care economy will be one of the fastest growing sectors of the future. Adequate investment in the care economy can boost women's labour force participation rates and help close gender gaps, by improving pay and conditions in the care sector and enabling working women and men to better reconcile work and family responsibilities. The challenge is to ensure that the jobs created are decent.

If we take this priority seriously, we must promote investment in care services and in the working conditions of care workers, create the necessary fiscal and budgetary space, and make quality care services an integral component of comprehensive national social security systems.

The second building block is: Strengthening women's control over their time. The very first standards of the ILO were about working time. Reducing working time was seen as a key factor, not only in promoting the health and safety of workers, but also in ensuring that they live a decent life outside work.

In the early days of working-time regulation there was little recognition of the household and care obligations that workers, especially females, also had to manage. In more recent times, the increased labour market participation of women has led to a number of challenges which until now have only been addressed in a piecemeal manner. In many countries, new so-called flexible working arrangements have emerged, some in collective agreements but many more outside any protective framework, which are said to provide greater flexibility and autonomy to workers. Especially where this flexibility is combined with precarious and non-standard employment relationships, without the worker having any influence on the scheduling of hours, the result is irregular and unpredictable working hours that are detrimental to the worker's physical and mental health and work-life balance. The emerging evidence is that the same is true for work in the platform or gig economy, where new technologies make every hour of the day and night a potential working hour, while the workers are falling outside any protective framework.

The reflections we are called on to make at this year's Conference on the General Survey concerning working-time instruments – Ensuring decent working time for the future may provide important pieces of the jigsaw and lead to guidelines for the ILO to act upon. It is clear that workers need working hours that can be adapted to their needs: predictability of schedules, guaranteed minimum hours of work and limitations on excessive working hours, as well as a real say, through social dialogue and collective bargaining, in choosing how their working time is arranged. These are all necessary to the push for equality that would give working women autonomy and control over their time, work and life.

As a first step, the ILO and its constituents should recognize that there are already quite a number of useful instruments available that could be promoted and more fully utilized, such as the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156), and the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (No. 175).

The third building block is: Valuing women's work fairly. The Workers' group welcomes the important work of the International Conference of Labour Statisticians, which adopted, in 2013, a ground-breaking resolution defining unpaid care work as work and making women's contribution to the economy, in all its dimensions, more visible. This is an important step towards addressing the persistent undervaluation of women's work.

The Workers' group is also encouraged by the formation of the Equal Pay International Coalition (EPIC), led by the ILO, the OECD and UN Women, with the aim to accelerate progress towards closing the gender pay gap by 2030, in fulfilment of target 8.5 and Goal 5 of the 2030 Agenda.

The Director-General's Report provides for two responses: the first is to further develop the statisticians' methods to accurately evaluate women's contribution to the economy and society; the second is to focus on more transparency with regard to pay differences between women and men and consider methods to require companies to take action to bring about concrete improvements.

Although these are useful steps, the Workers' group, taking into account that much has been attempted already on this important topic, would like to see more comprehensive and effective actions that make stronger links between and with the other building blocks, such as ensuring better pay for care work and addressing the over-representation of women in precarious and non-standard forms of employment that have a detrimental effect on their income.

The fourth, and not least important building block is: Raising the voice and representation of women. The Director-General's Report rightfully draws attention to the importance of "agency", meaning the possibility for women to raise their voice and be heard. We cannot stress enough the importance of the two most fundamental labour rights, namely the freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining, and of the need to ensure that these enabling rights are fully accessible by and respected on behalf of women.

We in the trade unions are fully aware of the need to modernize and adapt our policies and structures to represent both women and men more equally in the world of work and to stand up for women's rights and interests and put pressure on the abovementioned agenda for structural change. Let me tell you that increasingly we are succeeding in doing so. When recently in South-East Asia, I was struck by the number of young, strong and inspired women trade unionists leading their sisters and their unions towards improved living and working conditions in their workplaces and countries.

We thus fully support the call by the Director-General to reinforce the ILO's efforts to have women's views, perspectives and interests taken up across the whole range of its activities, including in development cooperation. This should be coupled with a call on the ILO constituents to step up their efforts to include women in their delegations and in the work of the ILO. In addition, we would like to see more action and activity on all sides to enhance prospects for women to take up positions of leadership.

This brings me to the final building block, and I can be brief here because we are discussing it currently in this Conference: Ending violence and harassment. In the future of work that we want, there is no space for violence and harassment against women, or indeed anybody else, nor for unfair treatment or unequal opportunities due to gender. We are looking forward to successful outcomes from the debate that is currently taking place in the Standards Setting Committee on violence and harassment at work.

In conclusion, there can be no future of work without women at work, and the future of work must be one in which women and men are different but equal. As we prepare to celebrate 100 years of the Organization and its laudable record of being at the vanguard of the push for gender equality, we must ensure that we do not take another 100 years to achieve this reality.

A final word on the other Report by the Director-General on which I have already spoken in my opening statement to the Conference, namely that concerning the dire situation of Palestinian workers, men and women in the occupied territories. We believe that the ILO has a very important role to play in this context.

(The Conference continued its discussion of the Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.)

Government (Switzerland)

Chair, Vice-Presidents, Director, Excellencies, Switzerland welcomes the Director-General's report. The proposal of an initiative on women in the world of work is absolutely relevant on the occasion of the centenary of the ILO. The ILO has in fact been committed to equality between men and women since it was set up. This founding value of the organization is right at the heart of social justice and of the fundamental standards ratified by Switzerland in the form of Conventions 100 on equality of payment and 111 on discrimination in employment. Now a few words about Switzerland's approach in the framework of the Director-General's initiative. First, this was an initiative for qualified personnel. With a view to responding to the general drop in supply of labour, the confederation, the cantons and the social partners want to mobilize fallow potentials via various different measures with a view to responding to the needs of the Swiss labour market. We want to improve the compatibility between working life and family life, and that is an absolutely fundamental condition for integration in the labour market of people who are not working, as also for the increase of the rate of employment of people who are working part time. To do this is essential, above all, to create high-quality services for caring for children outside the family, a favourable context for family life within companies and to eliminate the negative incentives provided by the taxation system. These measures should make it possible to improve access to the labour market for people who have family responsibilities. Equality between men and women is a precondition for sustainable development and for growth and for the benefit of all. Equality between men and women has also been set up as a crosscutting condition for all economic cooperation programmes in which Switzerland has been involved since 2013. In promotion of trade, for example, the idea is to improve the productivity and the involvement of women in value-added chains. In the area of the promotion of the private sector, there are programmes to promote entrepreneurship among women and access to financing for women. Switzerland has been working with the ILO for several years with a view to including gender dimension in all of its development cooperation projects. One of the flagship projects of the economic cooperation, as far as women's employment is concerned, is the ILO Better Work Programme, which Switzerland has been supporting since 2009. Eighty per cent of workers in the textiles sector are women and equality is an important component of that programme. Switzerland is part of the Equal Pay International Coalition aiming to achieve Objective 8.5 of Agenda 2030 on equality of pay for equal work between men and women. The idea of EPIC is to provide ownership to countries in function of their national priorities by addressing equality of pay which should be a reality for everyone today, and it also makes a contribution to eliminating poverty, equality of pay and justice for all, peace and social justice. As the Director-General mentions in his report, legislative measures are not enough, and they have to be accompanied by actions and provide results. They are nonetheless important to protect women in the world of work. Thus, in the spirit of the work that our conference has started on drawing up a standard to fight against harassment and violence at work, Switzerland has ratified the Council of Europe Convention on the prevention and combating violence against women and domestic violence. This entered into force in Switzerland very recently on the 1 April 2018. To conclude, Switzerland encourages all those involved to be involved in a constructive way on the drawing up of a new standard on violence and harassment in the course of this conference. Thank you very much for listening.

---

Mr Jiang

Worker (China)

Distinguished Chair, first of all, please allow me to congratulate you on your election as the Chair of the Conference. I believe that with your experience and wisdom the conference will be a complete success. The DG's report, The Women at Work Initiative, reviews the structure obstacles and the causes facing women in the world of work, bearing guiding significance for the fulfilment of 2030 SDGs. The push for gender equality is China's basic policy, and Chinese trade unions are committed to the protection of women workers. By the end of September 2017, 1.366 million collective agreements designated for women workers had been signed, covering 79.999 million women workers. We firmly oppose all forms of violence and sexual harassment at the workplace, thus offering effective protection for women workers. Delegates, the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China, with Comrade Xi Jinping at its core, attach great importance to the working class and trade union work. On the eve of this year's International Labour Day, in his letter of reply to model workers, the General Secretary sent greetings to workers across China and then pointed out that socialism can only be achieved by hard work. He emphasized that work is a most glorified and most lofty and the most beautiful deed. He called upon the society to respect model workers and carry forward their spirit so as to mainstream honest work and diligent work. At present, the Chinese trade unions are conducting activities to study and implement a letter so as to carry forward the spirit of model workers, promote the society to respect work and the workers, and reform the industrial workforce that's creating a knowledge-oriented, skill-based and innovation-driven workforce. Chinese trade unions are a mass organization formed voluntarily by the working class under the leadership of CPC, and they will, as always, continue the development path of trade unions of socialism with Chinese characteristics. The work of the trade union is an important part of the party's work with the social groups. The second edition of Xi's the Governance of China points out that we must maintain the party's leadership over social groups and ensure that they play a role of bridge and accomplish the central task served over interest and the worker, and keep abreast with times and remain independent and self-reliant according to their charters. Under the guidance of Xi's Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era, Chinese trade unions made the following accomplishments over the past year. Firstly, we adapted to the changes to the social and economic development so as to maximize the number of workers to be organized, including rural migrant workers. 2.809 million unions at the primary level have been set up with their membership totalling 303 million. Secondly, based on workers and the people's needs for a better life, we responded to workers' requests, promoted the Internet Plus Union Campaign, improved our ability to protect and serve workers, and built harmonious industrial relations. 2.46 million collective agreements have been signed nationwide covering 6.441 million enterprises and 280 million workers. Thirdly, we enhanced our ability to unite, educate, protect and serve workers and help them achieve decent work, comfort work and all-round development. 2.252 million enterprise unions at a primary level have set up a workers' congress system covering 250 million workers. Fourthly, we provided solid and targeted support to workers in a face-to-face and a heart-to-heart manner. During the New Year's Day and the Spring Festival in 2017 we provided assistance to 4.2 million workers and offered education loans totalling 980 million Yuan to 410,000 students. Chair, delegates, ILO is the platform for exchanges and the cooperation among workers and the unions of different countries. Chinese trade unions will continue to enhance exchanges with other unions and jointly protect workers' rights and interests. Thank you.

Mr Peeters

Government (Belgium)

Dear Chairman, dear colleagues, ladies and gentlemen, the fight for gender equality is a fight for a fearless society and a stronger economy. The great and positive correlation between women's right and the performance of societies and economies cannot be denied. A 2015 publication from the Hasselt University in Belgium stated that board members of listed companies see a positive impact on the company's performance when more women are part of the board of directors. This is why I applaud the ILO for choosing Women at Work as a central topic of this year's gathering. Over the years, Belgium has taken a number of steps to close the gender divide on the work floor and in people's pay cheque. In the past few years we have, for instance, introduced mystery calls through which social inspectors can actively investigate discrimination on the labour market. We supported social partners in updating outdated pay scales that increased the gender pay gap. Ladies and gentlemen, we need to rethink stereotypes and traditions. Men are still spending 1.5 hours a week more on paid work than women. In Belgium, 44 per cent of women work part time compared to 11 per cent of men. This is why I am working on a federal action plan for women at work together with colleagues in the Belgian government. This action plan will be focused on breaking with gender stereotype roles and on breaching the pay gap that, in the large part, is due to the difference in part-time work. Ladies and gentlemen, gender equality also means that women feel safe at work. Violence and harassment at work must be condemned, stopped and prevented. Belgium has a robust legal framework in place to protect its workers. Employers need to create a safe and secure working environment. They need to assess the risks and provide measures to protect their workers from work-related violence and other undesirable behaviour. This is why we welcome and support the ILO Convention and Recommendation that focuses on the protection against violence and harassment in the world of work. Safety should indeed be the alpha and omega of any workplace. We need to ensure that people who leave their families in the morning to provide for them, return safe and sound in the evening. Many of the accidents and incidents on the work floor can be prevented. The most tragic example in the past few years was, of course, the Rana Plaza catastrophe in Bangladesh in 2013. Five years on it is clear that we still need progress in this field. This is why this fall we will organize a conference in Belgium on due diligence in the textile industry. During that conference we will call upon industry to strengthen their efforts and to sign the renewed Bangladesh agreement. Ladies and gentlemen, in Belgium the social partners and the government are looking for the right way to deal with the digitalization of our economy and disruption caused by the platform economy. This is, by definition, a topic that crosses borders, which is why the ILO is the right forum to discuss these issues. A recent study showed that Belgian workers believe digitalization and robotization will not destroy jobs but will make their work easier and more interesting. We hope our efforts and those of the social partners will lead to realizing this optimistic belief in practice. Today, ladies and gentlemen, I plead for a continuing key role for the ILO on this topic and on many others. We support the necessary reform process of the UN system in order to make it more accountable, efficient and future oriented. We believe this reform offers the opportunity to the ILO to further develop and consolidate its specific role in the UN family. Moreover, we support the ambition for the ILO to play a role in post-conflict situations. In those places, it is not enough to rebuild the government and the checks and balances. There is also a need to re-establish civil society through social dialogue. The ILO needs to play a hands-on role in that respect. Belgium supports the work of the ILO. We will continue to advocate for a strong ILO and play our part in keeping this organization strong, relevant, and alive and kicking. Thank you.

Mr Rahman

Employer (Bangladesh)

Mr Chairman, allow me to begin by congratulating you on your election as President of 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like to compliment the Director-General for his comprehensive report, the Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality, which addresses various issues women face at work and challenges faced by women while entering the labour market. The report elaborates on the Women at Work Initiative, one of the seven Centenary Initiatives adopted by the ILO in the framework of its 100th anniversary to be observed in 2019. I appreciate that the ILO has raised this fundamental issue and challenge of discrimination against women at the workplace in the twenty-first century. I feel, however, that the ILO must also provide a more comprehensive roadmap for gender inclusion through evidence-based approach. While some women are indeed disadvantaged and continue to face discrimination in society and at the workplace, due recognition should be made on the considerable progress that has been achieved over the past decades as a result of national and international level efforts, in particular in those countries that have approached this challenge as a societal one. According to the UN Women's Annual Report of 2016-2017, empowered women around the world are achieving visible progress. The annual report cites various achievements for women which have resulted in 72 adapted or amended laws to strengthen women's rights in 61 countries and the training of 4,000 aspiring and elected women leaders in 51 countries. With regard to the world of work for women, the World Economic Forum Global Gender Gap Report 2017 tracks the evolution of the overall index since 2006 by geographic regions. It highlights the local progress towards gender inclusion undertaken over the past decade in regions such as Western Europe, South Asia, sub-Saharan Africa, Latin America and the Caribbean. Although more work needs to be done in all regions of the world, it records a narrower gender gap than the one observed 11 years ago. According to the World Economic Forum report of 2017, Bangladesh has topped the South Asian countries in gender equality for the third consecutive year, ranking 47th among 145 nations. The report is actually a bundle of progressive successes for us and Bangladesh. Firstly, the report shows that Bangladesh holds the first position, jointly with several countries, regarding enrolment in primary and secondary education. Secondly, Bangladesh became top performer in the South Asian region on the political empowerment for women. Thirdly, the report shows that Bangladesh is ranked 135th in economic participation and opportunity index. With regards to new opportunities and innovations, employers have witnessed that technology is offering a critical tool for women and men to reconcile work and family responsibilities, and as a result, many companies are increasingly offering the option for staff to have flexible work arrangements. The use of the expression 'non-standard forms of employment' as opposed to 'standard employment' is no longer useful, among other reasons because it fails to acknowledge the key role of diverse forms of employment to promote equal opportunities. The digital economy also offers important employment opportunities which women and men may not have had otherwise. The ILO should conduct additional research to assess how the digital economy is empowering women's purchasing and decision-making power, enabling women and men to afford care services and eventually allowing women to transition into more formal workplaces. We firmly believe that the ILO must provide a more ambitious contribution for gender inclusion. A huge number of women are now better positioned in the labour market thanks to efforts from employers investing in fair recruitment, compensation and promotions policies, generous work time schemes, and other work-related actions. We, however, need huge improvement, for example, in areas of non-discriminatory wage policies and in the attitudinal manner in which women get discriminated against in ways that are sometimes difficult to quantify. But a mere legal approach which adds burdens and shifts responsibility on companies would prove to be counter-productive and irresponsible. Public authorities need to design a policy mix which support this effort.

Mr Babayev

Government (Azerbaijan)

Your Excellency, Mr Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, first of all I would like to thank Mr Ryder and all ILO staff for their submitted report. It reaffirms again the core mandate of the ILO in supporting sustainable development and promoting social justice worldwide. We all acknowledge that any initiative arising from the concept of sustainable development involves setting and reaching more substantial goals in the context of social justice for each country as well as for the entire world community. It's no coincidence that achieving gender equality and empowerment of all women and girls is high on the UN 2030 Agenda. Despite considerable progress over the last decades, gender segmentation persists in all labour markets of the world. Women still face discrimination in employment, in decision-making and access to economic assets. They are forced to work in temporary jobs, enter in short-term or informal labour relations. Therefore, the topic of today's discussion is an opportunity to approach the world of work from a broader context of promoting gender equality and to shape our attitude to possible changes. Azerbaijan attaches great importance to gender equality and empowerment of women. As we celebrate the centenary of independence of Azerbaijan Democratic Republic in these days, we respectfully honour the legacy of the first secular republic in the Islamic world, including extending suffrage to women in 1918, 100 years ago. The Government of Azerbaijan continues to promote gender equality in all spheres of life by having ratified all the major international instruments applying to the protection of women's rights by putting in place strategies and state programmes on protection of women's rights, ensuring their equal representation at decision-making and expanding their employment opportunities. Macroeconomic stability and achievements in the economic sphere have enabled the Government to accomplish its political goals aimed at improving the social welfare of the population. Despite our accomplishments, we are confronted with persistent challenge to fully ensure social rights of the population. The occupation of 20 per cent of Azerbaijan's territory by the neighbouring Armenia, and over a million of refugees and internally displaced people in need of special care and social protection, poses a threat not only to our country's social development but to the whole region. Today in Azerbaijan, women constitute 50.1 per cent of our population. Women's willingness to compete with men on an equal basis, responding to the current challenges of the labour market, as well as their ability to assert themselves in new labour relations, result in their greater representation in governance, business and power structures. In Azerbaijan, female participation in the workforce is 48.6 per cent. For every 100 students in Azerbaijan there is an average of 47 women. 53.6 per cent of all scientific workers are women. The first Vice-President of the Republic of Azerbaijan is a woman. Women are adequately represented in electoral, management and judicial bodies. Women's equality and empowerment is also integral to our national agenda on SDGs. The establishment of a National Coordination Council for Sustainable Development was a relevant decree of the President. Voluntary submission of initial national review of six SDGs, including the Goal 5, is a further proof of significance of the SDGs for our country. Implementation of labour and employment policy under the ILO principle of tripartism, discussion and decision-making in the tripartite Committee on Social and Economic Issues, set up based on gender parity, are the preconditions for the success of this policy. Joint activities with the ILO within the second Decent Work Country Programme, the election of Azerbaijan as a regular member of the Governing Body of the ILO, is a further testimony of high regard of international community. Ladies and gentlemen, Azerbaijan submitted its bid to host World Expo 2025 in the capital, Baku. The main focus of the proposal is future of education, future of health and future of the work, issues of global importance for every individual, every society and every country. I would like to take this opportunity and to invite you to support Baku for World Expo 2025 bid. Thank you for your attention.

Government (Egypt)

In the name of Allah, the Beneficent, the Merciful, Mr President, Chair of the Conference, representatives, ladies and gentlemen, I would like to start by congratulating His Excellency, Mr Murad, on his election to the leadership of the conference. We repeat our support for his good conduct of our work. We'd like to make reference to the Director-General's report entitled Initiative for Women at Work, a new push for equality. In this context, Egypt supports the role of the ILO in promoting equality of women in the workplace as an important factor of a future which is fair and just for everyone, with a view to achieving social justice for all. Egypt has promoted equality for women in various different areas: the social, cultural, political and economic. We aim to protect women and to promote their role in the world of work. Our work to promote women in this sense was given an important boost in 2017 with the Egyptian Year of Women. Millions of Egyptian women profited from this initiative to provide them with more dignity in their life. We launched in that context a programme for seasonal workers. We have looked at the report on the ILO's work in promoting social justice through decent work in the past biennial. We support the principles set out there and recognize the role of the ILO in promoting equality. We need all of these initiatives to promote social protection, social dialogue and tripartism. We would state that social equality requires equitable representation and needs to overcome a situation in which religion is involved in politics and the economy. Over the past years, Egypt has faced up to all of the threats to our Arab Islamic State. Extremism has serious consequences for conditions at work. It has consequences on the rights to work. So therefore, the ILO has a part to play in the search for a solution to this problem at an international level.

Ladies and gentlemen, Egypt has implemented a programme to reform the economy and offer social reform. We have seen good results. Starting in the 2013 to 2014, reflects an increase in the employment rate, a decrease in the unemployment rate. We have created many new jobs. This is an important step forward. We have also implemented three new pieces of legislation on the world of work, on labour organization, on the right to organize and have also elected workers' representatives within companies. We have proposed a draft law on that to Parliament. Apart from that, Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, we would call for a clear regulation that we can agree on. It's important that the tripartite constituents are able to agree on clear rules so that these standards can enable countries to improve their legislative framework and adapt themselves to international standards. Mr Chairman, we are very much concerned by what is happening in the occupied territories. We are thinking of the victims who fall on a daily basis. Urgent intervention is necessary to fight against poverty and to promote opportunities for decent work and social justice to our brother Palestinian people. Thank you.

Employer (Ethiopia)

Mr President of the Conference, Director-General, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, it is indeed a great honour and pleasure for me to make a speech at this 107th International Labour Conference panel, which will discuss on effective ILO development cooperation in support of Development Goals, violence and harassment against women and men in the world of work, and social dialogue and tripartism. Mr President, to promote Decent Work Agenda, the Ethiopian Employers' Federation plays a significant role in contributing to the growth of our country's economy through the intervention and effort that support the creation of industrial peace and conducive environment for investment. Although the main purpose of the Federation is to protect the right of the employers, the Federation strives equally to create industrial peace that creates sustainable growth and productivity of enterprise. The Federation has 15 branches throughout Ethiopia and has expanded its membership to all industrial sectors. These sectors have created a lot of job opportunities to young unemployed people. It is also assisting its members and potential members to have good industrial relations, apply fundamental principles and right at work by rendering training and providing a legal service and advocacy. It promotes the employment generation in big and small firms, which is important in time of natural and man-made hazards. As part of social corporate responsibility, it is also collaborating with the Government and other partners on the issue of women harassment at workplace. Therefore, it has been creating awareness among employers, managers and workers, in particular reference to protect women workers from harassment at workplace. On top of this, the Ethiopian Employers' Federation is collaborating with the Norwegian Enterprise Confederation and conducting a number of training on social dialogue and tripartism in different parts of Ethiopia for employers' representatives, workers' representatives, employers, workers and community leaders, and creates a social dialogue network among member companies. It is believed that social dialogue is a major solution to conflicts and disputes that arise in various sectors of the economy and social life. Social dialogue is a civilized way of solving a problem. Generally, it was to achieve the four principle and rights: the right of freedom of association and collective bargaining, the effective abolition of forced and compulsive labour, the elimination of child labour, and elimination of discrimination in respect to employment and occupation.

All these achievements were not accomplished only by the effort of the Federation but also in collaboration with our partners, the Government, the worker representative. Especially the assistance of the Norwegian Enterprise Confederation and the ILO are a great value. Therefore, let me have this opportunity to thank NHO and ILO in this regard. Mr President, distinguished delegates, at this juncture I want to inform you that the Ethiopian Employers' Federation has celebrated its 65th anniversary on May 24, 2018. Also on May 22, 2018, it transformed into Ethiopian Employers' Confederation. Lastly, as I always say it, with regards to investment, I would like to inform participants of this conference that Ethiopia has a stable investment policy, ample manpower and wide range of national and international demand for commodities that are produced in Ethiopia. So come and invest in Ethiopia. At last, I would like to thank the ILO and the organizers of this conference for making it possible for me to stand here and call on workers, employers, government, international business, international agencies and organizations to join us in our effort. Thank you very much.

Ms Alsubaih

Government (Kuwait)

President, ladies and gentlemen, Heads of delegation, I welcome you. It is a pleasure for me to speak on behalf of the Gulf Cooperation Council to welcome you to this important international forum. I commend you, Chair, on your election to the Head of this conference, the confidence which has been shown in you, and we wish you the very best for your work. President, ladies and gentlemen, we read the Director-General's report with great interest, and it dealt with an issue which was of great importance. That is, increasing women's participation in the workforce. The Director-General's report underscored the issues which women are confronted with in the world of work: accessing job, the disparity in salaries paid to men and women. There is a figure of 20 per cent relating to those disparities, and there are different factors which mean that the world of work is not appropriate for women at the present time. Ladies and gentlemen, the society in those countries which make up the Gulf Cooperation Council is a young society, and the integration of women into the workplace is a key priority for us. We have called for gender equality in the world of work, and this is a vital part of our key text which condemns the discrimination of women. And we have also ratified the relevant international documents, and they showed the extent to which we are working to guarantee decent work for women. We have implemented national strategies to increase women's participation in the workforce and also to increase women's participation in businesses to help us also attain the Sustainable Development Goals. Beyond the clichés which exist, which state that women should stay at home and look after families, we have implemented social programmes to get women involved in education, to promote the role of women in implementing the SDGs. Ladies and gentlemen, Excellencies, thanks to the efforts undertaken by the international community, we must continue to fight to protect and improve the position of women in the Palestinian occupied territories. The occupying forces are completely ignoring the legislation in place which states that the Palestinian people need to be protected. The Director-General has familiarized himself with the deplorable situation of workers in the occupied territories following on from the occupying policy, so I recall the important role to protect the people in those territories, to end the violations and to guarantee the implementation of international standards adopted by this organization to end this occupation. The members states of the Gulf Cooperation Council, ladies and gentlemen, once again thank you for this opportunity to speak, and we wish you the very best of success in your work. Thank you.

Ms Ba

Government (Mauritania)

President, Directors-General, heads of delegation, representatives of the employers, representatives of the workers, ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of my country's Government, allow me to congratulate you, Mr President, on your election to the presidency of this session of the conference, which I am sure there is no doubt will be a great success. The subject of this session, centred on the Director-General's report, and addressing the question of Women at Work, and centenary initiative of the ILO, is of particular importance for our country, Mauritania. Mauritania has indeed been very much involved in reforms aiming to eradicate all kinds of discrimination based on gender, but also, and above all, the implementation of measures to assure fairness and justice in the access to work and equal treatment for all workers. Allow me, Mr President, to congratulate Mr Guy Ryder, the Director-General of the ILO, on his high quality report and on the relevance of the annex devoted to the traumatic situation of workers in the occupied Arab Palestinian territories. Ladies and gentlemen, Mauritania has ratified all of the fundamental labour Conventions of the ILO, has transposed them into national regulation and provided for their implementation. Mauritanian women have a privileged place arising from religious and cultural norms in our country, and the protection of their rights is an absolute priority in the policy of the President of the Republic, His Excellency Mohamed Ould Abdel Aziz. Through the action of the Government, headed by the Prime Minister, His Excellence Mr Yahya Ould Hademine, aims to address all of the problems suffered by workers in general, and in particular those who suffer from precarious employment or from discrimination at work. The economic progress realized in our country, despite an international context which has been rather difficult, has made it possible to achieve regular economic growth and to control inflation, which has had a positive impact on the conditions of life of workers and has made it possible to extend the availability of employment. Ladies and gentlemen, the Ministry for Public Service, Labour and the Modernisation of Administration is working untiringly on projects and programmes aiming to promote and consolidate social protection for workers. Some important milestones were passed in the course of this year. In particular the implementation of international conventions, mainly conventions related to the guarantee of fundamental rights of workers, and in particular those related to the protection of the rights of the most vulnerable workers. Thus, with the support of the ILO, our department has implemented the necessary measures to contribute to the implementation of all of the fundamental labour conventions. And allow me here to praise the constructive efforts of all those involved and to salute their commitment to working alongside us and our partners. In this framework, we have put into place a national action plan to eliminate child labour, in a view to implementing the provisions of the ILO Conventions numbers 138 and 182 on child labour. This is an ambitious programme, and it will be broken down into targeted activities in the next few months, and we will be calling on our development partners then to assist us in mobilizing the necessary finance. I can assure, giving you the importance of this action plan to protect our children, that the Government of Mauritania will provide it with the necessary priority. Ladies and gentlemen, the renovation and improvement of the institutional, legal and regulatory framework for labour is a very important part in our department's work, as we have put in place a project to strengthen the capacity of labour administrations so that they can work better to apply legislation on labour and social security. There will also be a follow-up and flanking evaluation system aiming at relevant indications. In parallel with that, we will continue to renovate and improve the legislative framework, aiming to implement all the international instruments that Mauritania has ascribed to. Ladies and gentlemen, the fight against precarious employment is a priority for our department, which has continued its efforts to formalize the informal economy in accordance with Recommendation 204. The objective is to guarantee and to provide public contribution of the labour administration to improve conditions of work and labour.

Mr Atwoli

Worker (Kenya)

President, Vice-Presidents of the Conference, distinguished delegates, on behalf of the Central Organisation of Trade Unions of Kenya that I lead, and on my own behalf, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General for presenting a focused and relevant report on the obstacles to gender equality and how they can be overcome as the International Labour Organization transitions into second centenary. Mr President, Madam President, it is no doubt that since the International Labour Organization's founding much work has been done by the organization and its constituency with respect to promoting gender equality globally. However, progress has been slow, uneven and uncertain in many aspects. COTU Kenya therefore welcomes the report's sobering observation that things cannot remain the same as it is no longer a viable alternative to the gender challenge. Mr President, COTU Kenya notes that the care economy can play a significant role in the push for gender equality if it is properly managed through proper policy integration at national, regional and international levels. The rapidly growing need for the ageing societies in many developed countries and emerging economies requires a huge investment which would include preparing a real supply of properly trained manpower to support the ageing demographic. To encourage the uptake of the many job opportunities presented by care economy, it is imperative that governments, working with social partners and with the support of the International Labour Organization and other international institutions, must be of necessity to create an enabling environment, support decent work conditions and outcomes of this sector. Madam President, while we agree that the working environment has changed dramatically over the years due to technological advances and the changing nature of work, many societies and communities are yet to reconcile work and non-work responsibilities. This non-recognition of unpaid work remains one of greatest obstacles to advancing gender equality and needs to be addressed through reconciling the time spent in work and the so called non-work responsibilities by both men and women. Madam President, the evolution of the flexible working arrangements to fit in with the changing work demands and the needs of modern workers presents a good opportunity for workers to rebalance the time devoted to paid work and family needs, thus ensuring that both men and women enjoy equal time in sharing responsibilities across time spectrums. Mr President, we also concur that for many developing countries the need to invest sufficiently in infrastructure development, including roads, energy, water and communication, remains central in strengthening the capacity of men and women in low rural settings to have greater control of their time. We at COTU Kenya therefore take this opportunity to thank our President back at home, President Uhuru Kenyatta, for unveiling the Big Four development agendas, which include to seek and boost employment in sectors with greatest potential of attracting a large majority of unemployed youth and women. More so, these include boosting food security, provision of affordable housing, expanding manufacturing and affordable healthcare will have significant positive impact on closing the gender gap in employment. We further congratulate the President and Right Honourable Raila Amolo Odinga for their decision to shake hands and reconcile their political differences after their bitterly contested 2017 election, something which has brought about the country's political, social and economic stability, and provided the necessary enabling environment for investment and economic roads needed to realize the achievements of the President's Big Four agenda. Lastly, Madam Chair, COTU Kenya therefore calls upon the Kenya Government to rescind the proposed amendments in labour laws which are aimed at limiting the workers' and employers' independence in choosing their representative to the key tripartite institutions such as National Social Security Fund, National Hospital Insurance and National Industrial Training Authority. Slight changes which seek to make it harder for workers to exercise their right to strike and also give the Minister power to declare certain services to be essential and therefore be illegal for workers in such sectors to exercise their right to strike, are against the International Labour Organization's fundamental Conventions 87 and 98 respectively, and this should be abandoned with immediate effect. I thank you, Madam Chair.

Government (Morocco)

Ladies and gentlemen, I am delighted to congratulate you on your election, President, to the Head of this Conference, and I would like to wish you and your staff the very best of success in your work. I would like to also thank the Director-General of the Office of the ILO and his staff for the remarkable work which they have undertaken, which they continue to undertake to ensure the success of this session. President, ladies and gentlemen, the increasing economic, social, political and security challenges which our society is confronted with, and which threaten its balance and cohesion, as well as the increased development of different work forms, production, relations and technical progress require from us a collective response adapted to workers' and employers' aspirations, and at the same time to the implementation of the Decent Work Agenda, competition and social justice. It also requires a new generation of social dialogue and collective bargaining on the basis of a win-win relationship which goes beyond the culture of confrontation and rivalry to a culture of understanding and closer links. One of the big dilemmas societies are confronted with, and in particular in developing countries, is the creation of jobs for young people, of which there are an increasing number. These jobs need to preserve their dignity and respect decent work standards. This challenge is growing with the increase in different forms of work and the decline in classic labour models, which also involves a challenge to certain ideas and paradigms which have framed our social thinking in the past, and an innovative creativity which combines demands for competition and the constraints of social protection and corporate social responsibility. Women are often the first victims of unemployment, under employment, wage discrimination and difficulties in accessing high posts. Thus the Director-General's Report The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality, which shows how limited efforts undertaken thus far have been in reducing the gender difference in the world of work, proposes a certain number of areas where flexibility could be introduced within the framework of dialogue and negotiation through increased flexibility for women, which would make it possible for them to meet their family obligations and their work obligations as well as offering ideas for how to reduce violence and harassment at work. President, ladies and gentlemen, on the Moroccan experiencing combating violence against women, the Moroccan Constitution made gender equality a constitutional provision, and the quest for equality is a constitutional aspiration, and we have been working to implement various UN Conventions and integrating them into our legislation, particularly in combating violence against women. On violence, we have criminalized sexual harassment in our labour law. On social dialogue, the Government of Morocco has established a solid partnership with the social partners through ongoing dialogue and an ongoing social dialogue which is also institutionalized. The Government has also integrated these elements into its programme. On economic development, we have implemented the South-South cooperation and the tripartite cooperation, and we have also recently held a workshop on South-South cooperation. Convention 205 has also been adopted. In conclusion, ladies and gentlemen, coming from a country which has always had new ideas, we will continue adopt positive positions.

Mr Al Ghafis

Government (Saudi Arabia)

In the name of God, the Most Merciful, the Most Compassionate. Mr President, the delegation of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia would like to congratulate you on your election as President of this session. We wish you all the success. We would also like to thank the Director-General of ILO for his endeavours to elevate this long-standing organization, and we commend his report for this year on the Women at Work and its related centenary initiatives, as well as the rest of the other six initiatives launched by the organization. Indeed, it's a great occasion for member States and social partners to work together to ensure women equality in the world of work and to provide decent working conditions for all, which are the main purposes of the ILO. Mr President, in the midst of our discussions in this session, which focus on the issue of women at work and the keenness of member States to address the problems and issues that stand in the way of activating women's role in the development of society, we would like to highlight the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia's achievements in this field along the Saudi Vision for 2030 which is based on three main pillars: a vibrant society, a flourishing economy and an ambitious homeland. The vision states that Saudi women are an important element of our strength, and we will continue to develop their talents and invest their energies and enable them to obtain adequate opportunities to build their futures and contribute to the development of our society and economy. Furthermore, the National Transformation Program 2020 contains 36 strategic targets that support economic empowerment of Saudi women and support women independence and self-reliance. We aim to increase women's participation in the labour market from 22 per cent to 30 per cent by the year 2030, which will increase its contribution by 3 per cent in the non-oil GDP. My country is very keen to support the work of women and overcome difficulties. Targets were put to achieve that by increasing the participation of women in the labour market and increasing the contribution of productive families, facilitate business start-ups and retail sector development, and increasing the contribution of SMEs. In addition to that, more focus was put on empowering women to achieve a balance between social life and work through the social welfare system that will give women greater opportunities without compromising their family commitments and the family member correlation. Among those initiatives to empower women, the Ministry has launched the childcare programme, Qurrah, to support the children's care services for working women and a transportation programme, Wusool, to support them as well. Also, there is a freelance programme which expands opportunities for increasing women's income according to her skills, and telework programme and part-time programme which enable care provider women to achieve balance between work and her family as well as it enables the empowerment of women in rural and remote areas to engage in the labour market. The results of these efforts was the number of women working in the private sector reached 565,000 at the end of 2017, which stands approximately at 32 per cent of Saudis employed in the labour market. Saudi Arabia initiatives to empower women weren't limited to enter the labour market only, but there are also other initiatives to enable women to reach leadership positions to achieve a gender balance. My country is keen to eliminate any discrimination in wages between male and female workers and has put the legislative aspect of equity and equal pay for work of equal value and considers it as a violation of the system if such is not respected. In addition, we are currently looking through sharing experiences with countries and international organizations' best practices in monitoring the application of such legislation to reduce the gender gap and achieve equality. My country has taken serious measures to fight all negative phenomena and behaviours that may harm the working environment, including violence and harassment, through the adoption of the Anti-Harassment Law this week, through the executive regulations of the Saudi Labour Law for violence and harassment cases adopted by the Ministry of Labour and Social Development, in which both have definitions and mechanisms to deal with such cases from reporting, verification and determining of penalties. We recognize that Saudi Arabia has always contributed in empowering women economically and developmentally speaking, and we are pleased to affirm that we always stand to contribute in any international effort to that effect.

Ms Markova

Employer (Bulgaria)

Thank you. Mr President, allow me on behalf of the Bulgarian employers to congratulate you with the election to this important position and to wish successful work to the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. The Director-General's report addresses the global social challenges and the role of ILO and its constituents focusing on the Women at Work as one of the ILO's Centenary Initiatives. This approach enhances the role of ILO as a global forum and effective instrument for implementation of core international labour standards in achieving economic and social prosperity in our societies. Bulgarian employers have their role in improving the overall positions and performance of Bulgaria in relation to gender equality. I will put the stress that Bulgaria takes 15th place in 2017, moving from 25th in 2015, according to the EU Gender Equality Index. Bulgaria takes the first place in the EU having share of 26.5 per cent of women employed in the IT industry while the average share for the EU is 70.2 per cent in 2017. Bulgaria also improved significantly its position from 44th to 18th place out of 144 countries according to the Global Agenda Gap Report in 2017. Further, allow me to outline briefly the priorities of the Bulgarian employers as follows. First, reducing administrative burdens in speeding up the adoption of so-called E-Government. Entering into Eurozone and undertaking further steps for achieving the very high EU social standards. I will only mention that Bulgaria meets all relevant entry criteria having also less than 25 per cent government debt to GDP ratio. Acceleration of the reforms in education and vocational training, health care and social security system and labour legislation. Bulgarian employers acknowledge the need to start a wide national debate for better labour regulations in response to the new reality of global economy and labour shortages we currently have. This includes also the adoption of flexible reforms of work relevant to the specific employees' and employers' needs. We also put the stress for better regulation and call for more balance and a rational approach to so-called postage workers and mobility package to be adopted at EU level. Fourth, improved procedures and access for third country nationals to the Bulgarian labour market. Achieving agreement on setting up of the minimum wage in accordance with the principles and criteria of Convention 131, taking into account the prevailing proportions to average and medium wages in the EU. The Bulgarian employers will actively participate in social dialogue at all levels, defending our positions based on the provisions of the Constitution and applicable ILO Conventions. We therefore rely very on the valuable experience of ILO and its constituents in settling similar cases. Social dialogue and cooperation for economic and social prosperity have no alternative. I'm closing by assuring you that we are fully supportive to the agenda of the International Organisation of Employers and its efforts in achieving the ILO's goals and values. Thank you for the chance to speak to this highly distinguished forum and to you for your kind attention. Thank you.

Government (United Arab Emirates)

In the name of God, The Most Merciful, The Most Compassionate. Mr President of the Conference, Your Excellencies, Heads of delegations, greetings upon all of you. I would like to start off by congratulating Mr Samir Murad, the Minister of Labour of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, as President of the Conference and to convey our greetings and congratulations to all the Vice-Presidents, wishing you all the success. The DG's report discusses one of the most important issues on the Sustainable Development Plan that has been accepted by all the leaders of the international community they plan to be achieved by 2030. I mean by that gender equality and empowerment of women. In spite of the progress that has been mentioned in the report in terms of bridging the gender gap, there are still gaps that exist in the health and economic fields, and I will focus here on the economic field. Ladies and gentlemen, one of the economic reports that has been issued recently by the McKinsey Institute indicates that gender equality would contribute to an increase of $12 trillion by 2025 in the global GDP. Thus, it is not an over-exaggeration to say that gender equality in terms of employment is an economic necessity as well as a moral and social necessity. UAE has understood this as of its inception, and it has adopted this as part of its Constitution, considering gender balance and equality as a national priority, and we have always endeavoured to achieve that. We have achieved one of the best performances in the region in terms of gender equality, whether it comes to high education or in terms of contribution in the labour market assumption of leading position and decision-making process of women. For example, we have nine female ministers, which represents 28 per cent of the total number of ministers. Women occupy 20 per cent of the Federal National Council, and it is headed by a woman, that council in particular. We have also legislation that stipulates for the appointment of women at the board of directors of all companies, which means that 30 per cent of our board of directors are assumed by women, and women have achieved 26.7 per cent of all executive positions in the Government. We have launched the National Strategy for Women Empowerment in 2015-2021. We have announced the establishment of the UAE Council for Gender Equality. We have taken many steps to speed up gender equality and to empower women, the most notable of which is the latest draft bill that was adopted by the Cabinet concerning gender equality in wages or in pay and legislation related to maternity leave in line with international labour standards. We have also created a government performance index, and that was for the purpose of gauging gender equality, and it is one of the first in the world. It has various concrete steps that could be implemented by the various institutions to achieve gender equality. Ladies and gentlemen, I would like to note another issue that was mentioned in the Report of the Director-General in terms of care industry. I agree with him that such a care industry would lead to decent work and would lead to further gender equality. That's why the UAE Government has adopted a law related to domestic workers last year, that is Law Number 10, and we have set up a certain department in our Ministry to develop the manpower in the Government. We have adopted the Abu Dhabi dialogue mechanism that was adopted related to Asia and the GCC countries to develop the field of domestic workers and particularly in adoption of domestic worker standards to achieve better situation for domestic workers.

Government (Côte d'Ivoire)

[Beginning of intervention missing in English interpretation] to the majority it takes, aiming to fight against discrimination to women. In fact, the Côte d'Ivoire has exceeded to various different legal instruments at an international regional level such as Resolution 1325 of the United Nations, the Convention for the elimination to all kinds of violence against women, the protocol of the African Charter of Human and Peoples' Rights, the declaration of Heads of State of the African Union, the declaration of the Heads of State of ECOWAS. At a national level, on the 8 November 2016, the Côte d'Ivoire adopted a new Constitution which consecrates equality between men and women through effective and shared participation at all levels and a written policy on equality of opportunities and gender equity. As you can see, Côte d'Ivoire has been resolutely involved in promoting, through actions and specific measures, the work of women and its fair value. Apart from the action of the ILO for more social justice, and in the light of the Decent Work Agenda and the 2030 Programme for Sustainable Development, has made it possible in each of our countries to see significant results as has been presented by the ILO's Director-General in his report. As far as it is concerned, the Côte d'Ivoire can be pleased to see that in the course of the biennial 2016 to 2017 there have been significant progresses in employment, work and social protection, and I would mention as far as employment is concerned, the evaluation of the first phase of our National Employment Policy 2012-2015, the adoption of the second phase of the National Employment Policy for 2016-2017, the realization of diagnostic studies of the information system for the labour market, and the strategy of promotion of employment for vulnerable groups, for the employment of disabled people, and for the functioning of informal commercial networks. Thus, thanks to the efforts of the Ivorian Government and supported by the ILO, the unemployment rate as defined by the ILO has gone down from 5.3 per cent in 2014 to 2.8 per cent in 2016. This effort for employment has gone hand in hand with the strengthening of health and safety at work following the ratification by Côte d'Ivoire of Conventions 155, 161 and 187 of the ILO. At the moment, the Ivorian Government has drawn up a national profile for safety and health at work. They did that in 2017, and that's an essential precondition for the adoption of its policy for safety and health at work and its budgetized action plan. This reform in safety and health at work, strengthened by the Labour Code passed in 2015, aims to guarantee the conformity of places of work with the regulation and to avoid accidents and damage to health resulting from work, linked to work or following work. Given this, the control mission carried out by the Labour Inspectorate, particularly in the informal economy, thanks to the lessons learned in the framework of the ADMITRA et PAMODEC projects has become more effective. It's important to emphasize in the framework of continued social dialogue and robust social dialogue with the tripartite mandates in Côte d'Ivoire, the national social dialogue organism was reformed in 2016 with the support of the ILO. And the support of the ILO has been very significant for the respect for fundamental rights and principles of work, in particular through the implementation development of a system for observation of child labour in Côte d'Ivoire and the determination of a list of light work authorized for children between 13 and 16 years old and the revision of the list of dangerous work which is prohibitive to children. In general, the various support given by the ILO has made it possible to promote decent work and equality between men and women, to consolidate social justice and to fight against harassment and discrimination at work.

Government (Uzbekistan)

Madam President, Ladies and gentlemen, allow me on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Uzbekistan to greet you all from this high conference podium. We congratulate Mr Samir Murad, the Minister of Labour from Jordan, on his election to the presidency of this session and also his deputies, and we wish all of them the best of success throughout the conference. Dear friends, Uzbekistan is a young independent state and is undertaking major reforms in all areas of its social, economic, cultural, humanitarian and political life within the framework of the development strategy which was adopted to cover five areas and covers the period up to 2021. Within the broad reforms, we are paying significant attention to cooperating with the ILO. We have successfully introduced our Decent Work Country Programme, which aims at dealing with the following issues. First of all, the development of our national labour legislation. Secondly, improving the labour market. Thirdly, guaranteeing jobs and social protection. Fourthly, establishing ongoing dialogue with the population. In our country, we have introduced a system of parliamentary and society monitoring of international labour standards, warning of and preventing the possible risk of the use of child and forced labour. Thanks to our successful cooperation with the ILO and other partners, Uzbekistan has made real progress in implementing ILO Conventions. We highly value and support ILO initiatives and activities aimed at guaranteeing active participation to achieve the Sustainable Developments Goals. We have introduced a road mark for the SDGs, which includes the participation of national partners as well as international organizations. Distinguished friends, we know that in order to guarantee justice and human rights in all areas it is important that we are involved in social dialogue. The ILO plays an invaluable role in strengthening social dialogue between the tripartite partners, and we welcome the principle of tripartism plus. In Uzbekistan, we are successfully implementing social dialogue between the Government, the unions and the employers. Civil society is also involved in the process. In May of this year a presidential decree created a consultative Council for the Development of Civil Society. The main aim of this is to create systemic and effective high-level dialogue with civil society. The activity of this council is being coordinated by the President of Uzbekistan himself. This step is a logical continuation of the success for the introduction of a mechanism to guarantee direct ongoing dialogue between the State and our population. Distinguished Chair, we welcome the discussion of gender equality at this conference. The Republic of Uzbekistan has also taken significant steps to improve the position of women in the political social, economic and cultural life of our country. Women's work is a part of our state policy. We have been establishing substantive measures to improve our institutional bases to guarantee gender equality in the world of work. Our action strategy for 2017 to 2021 includes new opportunities to improve women's education and their economic activity, to improve their inclusion in entrepreneurial activity and to strengthen the role of women in the state administration and society. In February 2018, a presidential decree on measures to improve the activities to support women and strengthen the institutions of the family includes broad opportunities to women to fulfil their potential. Distinguished conference participants, once again we express Uzbekistan's commitment to the principles of decent work and social justice. Gender equality must be achieved in all areas of our life, and we hope that our work will be successful. Thank you.

Government (Senegal)

President of the International Labour Conference, President of the ILO Governing Body, Mr Director-General, guests, ladies and gentlemen. As I start, I would like to warmly congratulate the President of the Conference and his two Vice-Presidents, who I wish every success in their high mission in the service of the tripartite constituents. Speaking for Senegal, I can say that we reiterate our attachment to the ideals and principles which symbolize our shared values and the governance for organizations, social justice, for economical progress and achieving the noble objectives of decent work. We see them as being more relevant than ever today, facing up with the new challenges of the world of work. On behalf of my delegation, Mr President of the Governing Body and Mr Director-General, I'd like to congratulate you on the quality of your respective reports. It's important to emphasize specifically the importance of the report entitled The Women at Work Initiative, a new push for equality, which invites us to think of a world of work which is seriously unjust towards women, despite their great contribution to the economy. Along with you, we hope that there will be opportunities to be found for decent work for women and for development for women in the digitalization of the economy and technological innovation. Nonetheless, it's worth recalling that the future of decent work for women in Africa and Senegal can also be found in the transition towards the formal economy in view of reducing the deficit of decent work from which they suffer. Our country, along with others, will continue the efforts it's already started in this framework, as is witnessed, among other things, by the adoption of the National Strategy for Equality and Gender Equality and the ratification of Convention number 183 on maternity protection. Apart from that, we very much salute the inscription on the agenda of this conference of double discussion, with a view to a standard fighting against violence and harassment at work. Given that the things that are at stake, we very much welcome that. Looking at the agenda, is very revealing. It shows the desire of the ILO, in accordance with universal objectives, to be more than ever the avant-garde of new initiatives aiming to improve the world environment and to make it a better place for those involved in work. And the preparation of the centenary initiative of the Future of Work, and looking at all of the instruments, makes it clear how important the prediction of human capital productivity at work and economic competitors are for us. We would also like to take advantage of this opportunity to address Senegal's thanks to the experts commission for the constant work that they have done helping member States to implement international labour standards in an optimum way. We have to here reaffirm the adhesion of Senegal to the legal instruments of the ILO, to the universal objectives of decent work for all, and all of the other issues proposed in the framework of the initiative for the centenary for the Future of Work. My country looks forward with optimism and hope to the conclusions of the World Commission on the Future of Work. Mr President, the general discussion on effective cooperation of the ILO in the context of sustainable development, and in the framework of the sustainable development objectives, which will make it possible to take the opportunity of the rapid transformations of the world and the reform of the new United Nations systems and the opportunity to reaffirm the place of decent work in the 2030 programme for sustainable development. The conclusions of the discussion should help us to achieve important achievements in the matter of equality between men and women, the promotion of international labour standards, employment and extension of social protection. There will also be an opportunity to evaluate and reorient many multilateral partnerships, South-South cooperation, triangular cooperation, with respect to the priorities set out by the constituents. As far as Senegal is concerned, new Country Programme for Decent Work has been drawn up, validated and signed, and that's a new era for our cooperation, which is already dynamic, and an opportunity to achieve Objective 8, which is decent work and economic growth in the Sustainable Development Objectives. In the same line, the recurrent discussion on the strategic objective social dialogue and tripartism give the constituents an opportunity to, once again, reaffirm and revisit the universal principles and objectives set out by fundamental labour standards, in particular Conventions 87 and 98 on freedom of organization and collective bargaining. In Senegal, we are pleased to see advances have been made thanks to the maturity of the tripartite parties. Thank you very much for listening.

Ms Talla

Government (Mali)

Conference President, ladies and gentlemen, members of the Office, delegates, I would like, on behalf of my government, to underscore the congratulations which have been addressed to the President on his election and also to the other members of the Bureau. President, delegates, we agree with the conclusions of the two reports and welcome the efforts taken to lead all ILO member States towards the implementation of the Decent Work Agenda. For the implementation of the Decent Work Country Programme, in our country, signed on the 14 April 2016, our Government has implemented a pilot committee made up of all the stakeholders and also preceded this work with the rereading of our Labour Code in June 2017. New provisions loosening up the ban on night work for women in industry, guarantees equal opportunity and treatment for citizens in the world of work and improves the access to education for young people in defining criteria for union organizations and other. In the sphere of social protection, draft text with a view to rolling out universal health insurance coverage in 2018 are in the Government's pipeline. This is a real challenge for the authorities in their work towards achieving Sustainable Development Goal 8. President, delegates, my delegation read with interest the report towards 2030, effective development co-operation in support of the sustainable government, with a view to the general discussion on ILO effective action to promote development cooperation. On this issue, all the national strategic documents, particularly those relating to the framework for the relaunch of our economy and sustainable development for Mali and the UN integrated framework 2015-2019 and the DWCP, are part of the work underway to achieve Goal 8 of the SDGs. President, my delegation is also supportive of the report and guaranteeing decent work for the future, a study relating to the relative instruments in place for working time. We have worked to change our labour code in 2017 and have looked to harmonize these provisions with the ILO and other international conventions, and in particular ILO Conventions 100, 87, 98 and C138. My delegation is delighted that the agenda includes the recurrent discussion on social dialogue and tripartism as part of the follow-up to the ILO declaration on social justice for a fair globalisation of 2008. The discussion on this report is an opportunity to reflect on the vitality of social dialogue in our countries, at regional level as well, and to also look at the difficulties which social partners and governments are confronted with in their search to promoting social justice. Also, we are looking to create a formal national framework for social dialogue. President, we were also particularly interested to read the report entitled Ending Violence and Harassment Against Women and Men in the World of Work. This first discussion will be an opportunity for governments and social partners to understand the phenomenon and to find the voices or the approach which we can take to end violence and harassment in the world of work. President, the Director-General's report entitled The Women in Work Initiative: The Push For Equality is an important contribution to improving the position of women at work. Throughout their professional life women continue to find themselves confronted with obstacles in accessing jobs and equal pay. President, delegates, the world of work of tomorrow depends on those actions which we take to support women today. Thank you for your attention.

Worker (Saudi Arabia)

Madam Vice-Chair, ladies and gentlemen, good morning. My country is racing time in order to join the ranks of fully advanced countries. It earnestly works in order to provide the conditions needed for decent living for its citizens and those who live on its soil. Equality in rights and duties amongst all the sectors of the Saudi society and the provision of decent work for them is of the top priorities and major objectives of the progress and stability of our country. The authorities in my country have opened the way to women in order to enter into many walks of life which were, in the past, exclusively for men. It has paved the way for more equality and equity in rights and in wages between men and women. Women have proven to be able and have even exceeded the skills of men. Saudi Arabia provides all possible means to create the opportunities of decent work for the youth from both sexes. As well as taking care of persons with disabilities, they have the chance to join the ranks of the work, and we do our best to remove all obstacles. We are walking firmly towards a promising future. The world has noticed the change and the progress that has taken place in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia lately. At all levels, in all sectors, in all cities and areas, amongst them, and most importantly, is the development of the regulations and policies of labour, the provision of new opportunities in new sectors such as tourism and entertainment, the support for SMEs and the development of investment. The development taking place in Saudi Arabia in a very short period on the basis of ambitious objectives and precise plans, in accordance with the National Transformation Plan 2020 in order to reach the vision of 2030, might take many, many years from other countries to build the infrastructures, the information, the technology, the communications. All these are needed to allow people to live in dignity and wellbeing. The leadership's adoption of the Quality of Life Programme which meant encouraging the economy, the investment in all sectors, especially the new sectors, the provision of an enabling environment to attract foreign investors, the preservation of the environment, are all excellent things. The road ahead is arduous and paved with challenges. However, with the support and able leadership that has the vision and the ability to implement and plan, that believes in social partnership and collaborating with employers' and workers' organizations to enact laws and economic, social, political and global policies, through social dialogue and tripartism. This is for the objective of realizing Decent Work agenda, the protection of labour rights and realization of effective economic and social justice. All the above will enable us to overcome obstacles in a brief period in order to realize the Kingdom's Vision of 2030. Thank you.

Mr Ayessa

Government (Congo)

President, Director-General and delegates, I am glad today to be able to congratulate you today on your presidency of the current conference. I wish you the greatest of success in your endeavours, which have begun very well. President, once again, the ILO is playing its core role and fulfilling its responsibility to define the guidelines, the standards, the principles and the fundamental rights required for decent and integrated work. Today, all players in the world of labour are invited to act jointly in line with the following objectives. First of all, cooperation for development and support for the SDGs. I would like to highlight the fact that the Congo has always supported the aim of sustainable development, which should be as cross-cutting and inclusive as possible by fully integrating the social dimension of the 2030 Agenda. That is the commitment of the Congo and his Excellency, the President of the Republic of Congo, Denis Sassou Nguesso, is committed to this goal. This means that we need to act in a consistent manner for more fair societies, for productive full employment and for the promotion of decent work. This will enable us to reach a more sustainable economic growth. Secondly, the eradication of harassment and violence against women and men, and thirdly, tripartism and social dialogue. The Republic of the Congo truly believes that tripartism and social dialogue are the foundations themselves of the world of labour. Without any real dialogue and without effective tripartism there will not be peace nor social justice. In the Congo we wish to aim for no gender wage gap, and we believe that for the same work we need the same wages. The recurrent discussion on social dialogue and tripartism, as per the ILO declaration on social justice for a fair globalisation, is truly pertinent today, as it was in 2008. The Republic of the Congo wishes to have a multi-partner approach. Social dialogue is not just a discussion platform. It is also a framework of definition for innovative public policies in terms of labour, employment and social security. Companies, of course, are facing great challenges in order to stay competitive to maintain or to adapt their activities to the changes. Indeed, social dialogue can establish the necessary convergences and balances between the liberal ambitions of businesses and the requirements for social protection and decent work. Here two attitudes must define the efficiency of social dialogue, i.e. trust and mutual respect. It is necessary to be able to speak to each other, to share diagnostics and to measure how we can move forward together in line with strategies that focus on the priority for compromise in order to preserve the rights and acquired social protection, the protection of labour and creation of wealth. It is this celebration of the virtues of social dialogue that I would like to highlight right now. I would like to say that we are on the eve of a new centenary for our organization. We have come a long way, and we have achieved a great deal, but the challenges are important. We need to fight against violence and harassment, against inequalities and insecurity at work. The effort to guarantee decent work for all in order to achieve greater social justice. Those are the conditions required to construct a future for all. In order to reach these objectives we need to focus on the new centenary, and I think that we will be able to adopt proclamations that relate to real action. Thank you very much for your attention.

Mr Almutairi

Arab Labour Organization

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, prayers on our Messenger. Ladies and gentlemen, President, distinguished delegations, As-salamu alaykum. At the outset, I should like to congratulate the President and members of the bureau and the representatives of all groups for the trust placed in their person, and I should like to commend the choice of this conference, which is the initiative of women towards equality. This is the new initiative, one of the seven initiatives on the occasion of the first centenary of the ILO. This represents the eternal effort deployed by all in order to overcome obstacles and to encourage production in the world and to reach equality between the sexes and to reach firmly towards the realization of the fifth objective of the SDGs 2030. This year, in my report to the Arab Labour Conference, I talked about the dynamism in the Arab labour markets, transformations and progress by seeing the new developments, unprecedented, such as the slow economic progress and the explosion of youth and the limited opportunities available, as well as the growth of migration and refugee flows. This means we have to enable women's cognitive abilities and knowledge to allow her to enter the market in order to increase her ability to compete in the labour market. It is impossible to develop a society that has been marginalized a very large percentage of the society. We have to enable women now to brief themselves of the new forms of work. These will enable women to enter the market and to improve her conditions of living and to live in a manner that is optimal with its role in the society and her family. This ambition is commensurate with the Arab Labour Organization's work that wants to improve the gender equality and bridge the gap between the participation of women and men in all walks of life. We have always reiterated the principle of equality in opportunity and wages and equality in education and training, as well as taking care of maternity leaves and maternity rights. Ladies and gentlemen, the recent escalation of hostilities by the Israeli occupation forces on the land of Palestine is a reminder of the continuous bloodshed that is leading to the deterioration of the economy and the social life and increases the sufferings of the people of Palestine. I should like to renew my call to the ILC and to the three tripartites to hold conference of donors in order to give support to the investment and to find new work for the youth in Palestine. In confirmation of the Arab Labour Conference Resolution number 45 in 2018 and what was adopted, we call for the review of the method and mechanism of the Committee on Standards in order not to have any selectivity on bias in choosing the cases that are breaching the standards. And we reiterate the importance of transparency and lack of bias in dealing with the Arab countries in order to preserve the credibility of the Committee on Standards. Thank you for your attention.

Government (Qatar)

Your Excellency, Chairman of the Conference, Your Excellency, Director-General of ILO, Your Excellencies, Ministers, Ambassadors and Heads of delegations, dear employers, dear workers, ladies and gentlemen, dear participants, may the peace of God be upon you. Your Excellency, Mr Chairman, I am honoured to congratulate you on the beginning of this session to wishing you all the success in your task while confirming to you our cooperation with you and the participating delegation for the success of the conference. Ladies and gentlemen, the Report of the Director-General for this session included a very important topic relating to the achievement of the SDGs by 2030 and calling for empowerment of women and action towards gender equality. In this context, Qatar is continuing its efforts in order to guarantee all the equal rights between men and women, and we have the opening of the Technical Cooperation Bureau in joint collaboration with the ILO Office in Dohar and beginning of the current year came to achieve all these objectives. Ladies and gentlemen, Qatar is keen to implement all its commitments towards the international conventions and regional conventions, especially the CEDAW Convention that condemns all kinds of discrimination and violence against women. Qatar is keen also to comply with all the international laws and the national laws relating to women. It is ready also to do its utmost in order to empower women and to increase the participation of all women in all sectors and on all levels. I would like to seize the opportunity and note that women in Qatar have occupied very high ranks, very important positions, and they have become very competitive in all sectors of life in the Qatari society and elsewhere. The Qatari legislations are striving also to give all the opportunities and all the equality to women and especially to guarantee equal wages between men and women and also to guarantee training and performance for both men and women. Moreover, Qatar has deployed all its efforts and gave all the support to women in order to follow all these rules. It has also supported women, not only in Qatar but elsewhere also, especially in the poor countries. We would like also to seize the opportunity to express our concern about the plight of Palestinian women in the Arab-occupied territories. These women are deprived from their basic rights. This implies the need for more and further efforts in order to improve work based on the international standards. In conclusion, I would like to reiterate that Qatar will spare no efforts with its cooperation with ILO. It will keep on working in order to consolidate the rights for workers on the local, regional and international levels in order to guarantee the noble message of the organization. It will always work in order to improve the professional life and community life for workers in order to have safety, security, as well as welfare, all over the world. I would like to thank you for giving me the floor and for your attention, and I wish full success for this ILO session, and may the peace of God be upon you. Thank you.

Worker (Benin)

President of the 107th International Labour Conference, Director-General of the ILO, ladies and gentlemen delegates and technical advisers, ladies and gentlemen, I am here representing the Workers' delegation of Benin in order to give you an overview of the real situation of the workers in my country in view of the quest of decent work, which defines our tripartite organization. Our meetings now are taking place at a time when everywhere across the world workers are confronted with invented realities in the name of profit and profitability. We cannot ignore that today the fundamental principles and rights that are at the heart of the ILO's mandate are in a very bad state across the globe. The pillars of Decent Work are still a dream for millions of workers across the world, and this is why I am pleased to see the issues raised by the Director-General, and at this 107th International Labour Conference, which are highlighting the need for achieving the objectives of Decent Work to construct our future. For a while now, Benin has seen a decline in collective bargaining and freedom of association. Despite the fact that we have a legal framework that integrates international standards, there is a series of legal provisions and governmental practices that have disturbed labour relations, and now thousands of workers are even more vulnerable than before. Pertinent provisions to protect the rights of workers are unilaterally called into question, and the aim here is to create employment by attracting investors. The attacks on social [vgr INAUDIBLE 2:48] and trade unionists [vgr INAUDIBLE 2:50] are continuing, namely with a legislative attack against the freedom to strike for workers in health care and the judiciary. I would like to highlight within this framework that the standards examination mechanism is important. We should continue to protect the right to strike as a real element in freedom of association. We must reconstruct social dialogue. We need to restore the virtues of tripartism and of collective bargaining. In 2017, there was a problem on the level of workers in Benin. We must never forget and stop insisting on the protection of the right to strike as a fundamental basis for freedom of association, and we must continue to focus on achieving the SDGs based on the pillars of the respective rights. We need to create rights. We need to promote the equality of chances, and these really should be the objectives of governance. We have a lot to do, and the women must also take on a greater role in society. The trade unions of Benin will continue to play their role in diplomacy, and they will be firm in their aims to create a less lacklustre future for workers. Long live the ILO. Thank you.

Mr Idriss Samrieh

Government (Djibouti)

Your Excellencies, Director-General of the ILO, ladies and gentlemen, Ministers of the member countries of the ILO, representatives for employers, for workers, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, it is a great pleasure and honour for me to be here today at the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to salute the delegates and colleagues from our country's friends who are present at this conference today. The Ministry, of which I am at the head, basically has a role to regulate the labour market. The missions that are the objective of my ministry aim to elaborate, ensure the application and develop labour legislation to conceive active policies to create favourable conditions for job creation, promote reforms in order to improve institutions and manage state organizations as well as organize and extend social security. In all these areas, the Ministry is committed to establishing measures and reforms. The challenges that the country is facing are well-known, and they are shared by many nations that are present at this august assembly. Our concerns relate to human resources, creation of jobs, poverty reduction, creating a public administration that is more efficient and that will push forward development. These priorities are those that are listed in the Sustainable Development Goals for 2016-2030. The objectives of the policies of our Government, in terms of economic development, is based on granting greater value to the natural resources of Djibouti. Djibouti must become a commercial platform for services in the region in order to ensure employment, a creation and a reduced poverty. There is a very high unemployment level, especially in terms of youth unemployment. In order to create jobs and to speed up development, the Government has launched an ambitious programme that is called Vision Djibouti 2035. The aim is to create 200,000 jobs by 2035 and to bring down the unemployment rate from 48.2 per cent to 10 per cent. In addition to the strategy that underlies this vision, the SCAPE has established five-year plans that focus on the following sectors. Transportation, logistic, public works and construction, telecommunications, and the catering industry. This year, in terms of gender equality, there has been great evolution in Djibouti. In 2018, in the month of February, the number of women in Parliament has been brought up to 25 per cent, i.e. from 7 members to 17 members. The country therefore aims to appropriate itself with the main international instruments to protect the rights of women in Djibouti. The message of the ILO of the promotion of Decent Work has been well heard in the country. The Minister of Labour has adopted a text that will fix minimum wage to $200 a month for public and private sectors. In terms of social protection, Djibouti has expressed its wish to launch a large social project in 2014 in order for universal healthcare to be established. This has also been extended to the refugees in Djibouti. There is indeed a great challenge in Djibouti. We need to remain a peaceful and stable country in a region that is affected by conflict and crises. Without peace there is no social progress. I would like to thank you for your attention.

---

Worker (Lebanon)

Mr Director-General of ILO, Your Excellencies, Ministers and Ambassadors, dear members of the delegations, dear participants, ladies and gentlemen, Mr Chairman of the Conference, one year separates us from the 100th anniversary of the birth of International Labour Organization. This noble and pillar organization that is tripartite in its representations whereby which you have the workers that are being represented. It has long played a leading role, not just in terms of labour and work and also in terms of world peace and security by striving to guarantee decent work in all societies. I salute this noble organization and its history, and we encourage it for further work for social justice and world peace. Dear friends, we have thoroughly read the Report of the Director-General about the social dialogue and the situation in the Arab-occupied territories and all what was titled in the report and also under the title of the initiative for the work of women, moving towards equality. And this is why we highly salute this approach, this methodological approach, and that included all the analysis and the conclusions of the reports, especially Chapter 5 and the paragraphs relating to women empowerment and the recognition of the value of their work and by making women more heard and more represented. We have thoroughly considered all what came in the report about the social dialogue. We strive for further work in order to institutionalize this dialogue and to have equality between all its parties, and we need to translate this into practical programmes that serve the national interest and not just one single party. And based on all these considerations, we signed, we and the employers and the State in Lebanon, under the auspices of ILO and its contribution, the National Programme for Decent Work 2017-2020. It includes many of the objectives that strive at being fair and equal for women. We will cooperate with the ILO in Beirut in order to achieve this ambitious programme.

And on the other hand, and in the context of the discussion taking place about violence in the place of work, we as a federation, we consider that we need to sign a Convention and not just adopt a Recommendation with regard to the method. Ladies and gentlemen, we are addressing you, and we come from a region that has long experienced, since 70 years, terrorism, organized state terrorism in other words, since the creation of the Zionist entity, since 1948, at the expense of the Palestinian people that is the owner of these territories. And we can name the massacres that were perpetrated by Israel against the Palestinians in Gaza, and they are not just the first. All those who try to demonstrate and they wanted to just exercise their right to demonstrate. So we come to you and address you from a region where we have terrorists that are operating, they come, tekfiries, be they tekfiries or whatever they do, they come, they slaughter people from Lebanon, from Syria, in Iraq, in Egypt, Libya, Yemen and you name it. And all these gangs are just hidden under their slogans of religion, and they have moved us backwards in order just to exercise control on the expertise and the potentials of all these weak states. These gangs, these groups, are striving to get rid of all the ambitions and aspirations of the peoples. In Lebanon on 25 May, in Lebanon in particular, we celebrated the anniversary of the liberation of the Lebanese territories and the end of the Israeli occupation, and this had never occurred since the celebration of the establishment of the Zionist entity. We actually were victorious, and we won over all the aggressions and the destruction of infrastructures, and Lebanon managed to resist thanks to its resistance and to its army. As a result of this, we managed to face and resist this aggression, and we started concentrating on development and decent work for our workers and for our youth, and we are now concerned with the future of the young generations. And we believe, dear friends, that ILO, that was established after this World War I and that announced its objectives and it developed after the Second World War, has always operated for the struggle of all peoples in order to liberate all territories and to get rid of all kinds of colonisation. ### Employer (Nepal)

Excellencies, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, it is indeed a great honour for me to address on behalf of Nepalese Employers in this plenary session of the International Labour Conference here in Geneva. Let me begin by congratulating honourable Chairperson and also express my great appreciation to the ILO Director-General for his important report. This year we have several encouraging aspect that will definitely contribute to promoting the employment industrial relation and productivity for the national economic growth in Nepal. Mr Chairperson, it is exciting to share that we have a newly elected government in place at the federal, provincial and the local levels. It is a great sign of political stability after a long political transition in Nepal. Legal reform for the labour market governance is another significant achievement that we made recently in our common understanding. We have revised the Labour Act and developed the contribution-based Social Security Act, which are the key milestone for promoting industrial relation and workplace cooperation. We believe the social dialogue is a key mechanism for industrial relation. There is a provision of Central Labour Advisory Committee with tripartite representation, which we would like to replicate in the provincial and the local levels to promote the culture of social dialogue. Employment promotion and inclusive economic growth are our main priorities in Nepal. However, I believe the sustainability of the enterprises and their extension is very important both for job creation and economic growth. It is a hard fact that growth alone cannot materialize social justice unless share of the growth reaches to the grass-root level. Therefore, sustainable enterprises, growth and the appropriate policy measure are significant for social transformation. We are strongly committed to contribute in global agenda Sustainable Development Goal, particularly on decent work and economic growth. Mr Chairperson, capacity building for the employers' organization and its member enterprises is very important, particularly for women entrepreneurs to bring them in the business leadership. We want gender equality and free from any type of harassment in our organization and workplace. We are also restructuring our federation in line with the new governance system in Nepal, in which we'll need the further capacity to address the industrial relation, enterprises, promotion and job creation in order to address the need of the skilled manpower. We would like to provide the market-based training for our young people entering into the labour market. Responsible business conduct is our strong commitment for social cause. ILO technical and social support in this area would be great support for us in Nepal. Mr Chairperson, I am proud to share that overall business environment is significantly encouraging in Nepal, followed by political stability and the legal reform. Therefore, I would like to have advantage of this important gathering to appeal all international business community to explore for possibility of the new project investment in Nepal. We have several potential area such as tourism, agriculture, infrastructure development, mining and cement, digital technology, hydropower, including production in the service sector. Our federation will be happy to offer the necessary support and collaboration in these regards. Finally, we are excited to celebrate the 100 years of ILO establishment in next year. Let us consider sustainable enterprises for employment promotion is one of the key aspect for this special celebration. Thank you.

Worker (Belarus)

Distinguished delegates of the Conference, I would like to greet the participants of this 107th ILC on behalf of all of the 4 million members of the Federation of Unions of Belarus. Over the last 115 years, it has been a main principle of our union to ensure the fairness and the equality of all workers. Hence, here it is of key import for us to discuss the subject which has been put forward by the Director-General, Women at Work, struggling for equality. The main indicator of employability of any worker should, in our view, be professionalism and not gender. Our country has made significant progress in this area, and it's mainly been thanks to joint efforts of the Government together with unions and civil society we've been able to tackle a lot of issues. For unions, what is of key import is that our country does not have any female employment challenges. In fact, the level of employment of women of the working age in our country is more than 82 per cent. Amongst those who are unemployed, there are only 35 per cent who are women. This is the result of continuous work to ensure equality in all areas. It is unquestionable that parental leave should be assured, and is assured in our country, to men and women together, paternity or maternity leave, and this lasts for three years. It's also key that in our legislation people who take this maternity or paternity leave may return to their previous post. Also, employers must extend employees' contracts, if the employee wishes, up to five years of age for the child. Moreover, women who choose to take maternity leave have the right the retrain, re-educate themselves, re-qualify, and they also have insurance. And this holds true for women who are members of unions, and it helps to ensure women's place in the labour market is less precarious, and this maintains a balance in society. However, we do, of course, share the view of the Director-General that today we cannot just be content with existing instruments for equality on the labour market. We must look further to the future, and we must understand how the economic paradigm, which is inevitable, will impact female workers. When considering how we can ensure the labour rights of women, one must look at everything in concert, everything together, the challenges and the opportunities of the future of work. In this connection, I'd like to underscore that the Belarusian Federation of Unions aims to contribute to the reflection on this subject. In 2017, an international forum was organized under the aegis of our Federation of Unions. This forum was entitled Unions and the Future of Work, and we had representatives from some 30 different countries of the world. We considered such issues as how to look at changing forms of employment, how these changing forms will impact the economy, and the IT breakthrough. And just a short time ago, a unions and green jobs forum was held in Minsk, and we had representatives from some 38 different countries. So this is one more step that's been taken by the Federation of Unions to ensure a sustainable future of work for each and every one of us, and this is important not just for us but for the international community. Every single day we see armed conflicts arising, and let's be honest, the main cause of these conflicts is a fight over energy resources, and so that's why social partners need to put their heads together and think about how we can assure a transition to a green economy so that we reduce the risk of new conflicts over resources arising and that we have a fairer economy. It's clear that the technological boom, as well as the transition to a green economy, they represent opportunities for employment for people, but they will also change what professions are needed. And that's why, at an international level today, we need to thoroughly consider which professions will become obsolete and which will be needed. And today we only have scattered data to help answer that question. It doesn't really paint a full picture of what will happen in our common future, and it's certainly not a basis for future decisions. In order to understand how we can create a strategy for vocational training, for education, for retraining, for people's employment, we need to have strategic recommendations from international institutions and organizations. We must understand how we can protect people, those working in non-standard forms of employment, and we need to do this in a rapidly changing world. For our part, our Federation of Unions will do everything to ensure that it can make proposals on this subject and will put it to your consideration in the near future. Thank you very much, sir.

Government (Mauritius)

Allow me Mr President to congratulate you and your Vice-Presidents on your well-deserved elections. The ILO is indeed at a momentous time in its history heading to its centenary celebrations next year. Our challenge of the day and the years ahead remains the rapid transformation in the world of work, and in this regard, Mauritius welcomes the ILO initiative on Future of Work and is ready to support ILO initiatives on Future of Work. As it enters the next century, we hope that the Global Commission on the Future of Work will seek, in its recommendations, to factor in the well-being of the people, taking into account their different and uneven levels of development. The Director-General, in his report and his statement on Monday, has underlined the need to promote social justice for decent work, new instruments to eliminate workplace violence and harassment, and innovative actions to close gender gap. He also called upon the ILO tripartite constituents to act together to bring about continued improvement in the world of work. His discourse needs our urgent heed in view of our shared and collective commitment to the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. Mr President, my delegation also attaches great importance to the issue under discussion during this session, and we look forward for fruitful outcomes on social dialogue and tripartism and the ILO development cooperation. In Mauritius, social dialogue has always been instrumental in the domain of policy-making. In fact, social dialogue is conducted at the highest level by the Honourable Prime Minister who presides over the National Economic and Social Council, which seeks, first up, consensus building on economic and social issues of national importance among social partners. The Government of Mauritius recently took the bold decision to set up the national minimum wage. Here I wish to emphasize that this has been achieved through our sound and solid social dialogue and tripartism. You may also wish to note that we are framing our national employment policy, and this has been possible through the social dialogue. Mr President, in line with the Sustainable Development Goals and ILO applications of standards, I wish to reiterate the strong commitment of the Government of Mauritius in creating decent jobs, advancing the cause of workers and reviewing the existing labour legislations with a view to further consolidating the fundamental rights of workers. In this context, we are envisaging to introduce a Wage Guarantee und to protect workers of the private sector from loss of employment without wage and indemnity following winding up of their enterprises. We are also in the process of formulating the second generation of Decent Work Country Programme. The country priorities identified by the social partners are promotion of employment across all sectors through innovation and productivity, and improvement of working conditions through protection of rights at work. Mr President, Mauritius has an ageing population and also a declining population due to failing fertility rates. This constitutes a great challenge for the future of work in our small economy. We have to shift our sustainable employability through reskilling, training and using new technologies. Mr President, Mauritius, like many small island developing states, has lately witnessed several climate phenomenon. Climate change affects, among others, the future of work. This situation calls for concerted action at regional level. We, as members of ILO, must continue to rise to these challenges and come up with pragmatic solutions. With these words, Mr President, I wish once more to reaffirm that Mauritius is strongly committed to the ideals of ILO. We are equally committed to pursuing ILO founding mission that social justice is essential, universal and lasting peace. Thank you all for your attention.

Worker (Morocco)

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, Mr President, Mr Director-General, ladies and gentlemen, on behalf the Moroccan Workers' group that is represented by serious national trade unions who had a pivotal role in defending the just causes of the working class, I am honoured to extend to you, Mr President, and through you to the members of the bureau, congratulations upon your elections and to the organization with all its constituents, to thank you for the excellent organization and all the effort that is deployed all through the year in order to achieve the noble objectives for which the global trade unionist movement has fought bitterly. The topics chosen this year stem from an adequate diagnosis of the situation. Crises, combatting trade unionist freedoms, violence, discrimination, stumbling blocks in the social dialogue and other variables that definitely will be leading to a new forms of work that will transform the concepts long considered intrinsic to fundamental rights and social justice. Mr President, the subjects under discussion in this session are considered the core concerns of the trade unionist movement in Morocco, and they are the basic tenets of ILO because we have launched a dialogue for seven years. However, the Government and the Employers' group did not come up to our expectations, and neither accepted to improve the wages nor to improve the legislations and social protections. On the contrary, the Government took unilateral actions such as transferring the law on industrial actions to the Parliament without consulting with us, and their attempts to change also the labour law to be in favour of the Employers' group. However, we cannot compromise or renege the legal and democratic gains achieved after an arduous struggle by the Moroccan people. Ladies and gentlemen, the abuses and violations faced by the working people at the workplace is becoming violent in many places, which means that we need to adopt an international convention to eliminate this phenomenon. We also must find true will and true means to protect women and allow them to reach the work market on an equal basis. The last Report of the Director-General, and its conclusions on the Palestinian territories, will remain ineffective unless Israel is compelled to pay the accrued wages in its position which it owes to the Palestinian workers and to cease from further crimes and violations against the Palestinian people. The Moroccan trade unions would also like to categorically reject the decision taken by the American president of moving the embassy of his country to East Jerusalem. This is the final blow that has aborted the peace process, which would have led to peace and stability in the Middle East had there been peace. Ladies and gentlemen, Mr President, one cannot speak of a visible role for the ILO in development without the availability of the basic conditions needed globally and nationally, which is security and stability. In my country, terrorist attacks coming from the Sahel region and the Sahara will impede any development in the region, hence the responsibility is upon all of us to fight the trafficking and people gangs, the drug gangs and the smuggling gangs and all forms of terrorism spread in vast areas that remain out of control. Lastly, I should like to renew our thanks to the Director-General of the ILO and through him to his staff and the experts wishing this session every success and looking forward to next year's centenary celebrations for more social justice, for more trade unionist freedoms. And thank you for your attention.

Mr Kipefa

Government (Papua New Guinea)

Ladies and gentlemen, let me at the outset acknowledge and commend the Director-General for his leadership in spearheading the ILO's strong footing in the area of decent and productive work through sustained collaboration with global groupings and in the United Nations. The issues raised in the Director-General's opening statement that aim to make the ILO more effective and efficient, hence ultimately increasing its influence in promoting social justice in the world where it is badly needed, is strongly acknowledged and supported as it comes at no better timing than on the eve of organization centenary. Mr President, Papua New Guinea responds to this statement, and the agendas put before the Conference is centred on three main areas of concentration of a lot of relevance and value to our national context. Firstly, the challenge of inequalities at the workplace was given the highest recognition at each level, and Papua New Guinea fully support the initiative by the ILO to zero down on the issues of women participation at the workplace and push for equality.

We concur with the current premise of the ILO's role in equality that whilst the ILO's record is good, achieving the goals set remains far-fetched, and the road to achieving outright equality is slow and uneven. Papua New Guinea values the equality of opportunity notion and will support any efforts that aim to cap all forms of discriminations, harassment, violence, deprivation of opportunity and inequalities at the workplace that threaten our very existence and agenda to develop a nation inclusively. Furthermore, Papua New Guinea sees value in the ILO and UN's effort in having gender equality and women's empowerment as one of the SDGs in the UN SDG 2030 Agenda that aims to achieve social justice. Secondly, Mr President, at this time of heightened tension, the call to improve and the extension of social protection coverage must come to the fore. There is an uneven playing field that has left sectors of the population vulnerable to calamities and misfortunes. In support of the ILO's call for greater interaction among the tripartite partners, we would like to extend this call to be more deliberate and target-orientated to address the issues of unemployment, exclusion, disabilities, genders. And thirdly, Mr President, Papua New Guinea offers its strong support to the recognition of the ILO as an agency for change in the world of work. In this era of difficulties, complexities and deepening tensions, the ILO's mandate, unique system and process of collective responsibilities, tripartism and social dialogue becomes ever more relevant when it become increasing harder to talk to, listen and to weigh the merits of each for the compromises and win-win outcomes. Mr President, at the national level, efforts are being made to ensure that equality to achieve amongst all woman and men in workplace. The country has also in place and institutionalized its Gender Equity and Social Inclusive Policy to make gender equality a priority in all government agencies and ultimately eliminate all forms of discrimination, inequalities, harassment against women in the workplace. To further strengthen the overall achievement of social justice, in December, Papua New Guinea will once again put pen to paper with the ILO next week Monday, 4 June 2018, and sign off its third Decent Country Work Programme for the period 2018 to 2022 here in Geneva. This tripartite signing signifies our unrivalled commitment to achieve social justice at the country level. Thank you.

Government (Libya)

In the name of God, the Clement, ladies and gentlemen, it is a pleasure and an honour for me to address this august assembly at the 107th Session. Sir, I would also like to thank the office for its trust. I do wish the ILO the best of success in directing this Conference. It is an honour for me today to be able to express my gratitude to Mr Guy Ryder, Director-General of the ILO, with his aim to improve working conditions across the Arab world. The aim is to guarantee decent work. The Arab group sees this subject matter as very positive. The issues raised at this 107th Conference are very important to us, i.e. Women at Work, amongst others. There are many solutions that are proposed. It is true that the international community has done a lot to try to improve the situation of women in the world. However, the efforts that are made across the globe are asymmetrical. They are done at different speeds, and that is why it is important for us to really try to guarantee gender equality. We also are pleased of the work carried out by the Committee in order to fight harassment and violence at work. Indeed, this is a guarantee and a fundamental principle, according to which the decent work will be guaranteed. There are new forms of work that are appearing, and women work in the informal sector. The Arab group supports the contents of the report issued on this matter. We will not stop at any effort in order to face the challenges that we face as well as the ILO. These challenges are the fight against poverty and violence and harassment against women. My group will firmly strives to attain the SDGs by 2030. Ladies and gentlemen, despite our commitments to meet the challenges and to fulfil the SDGs, we cannot ignore the situation of both male and female workers in the Palestinian territories. They are still deprived of their rights and live subject to Israel. We would like to support the cause of the Palestinian people. It is a just cause, and this population has been deprived of its rights, and we need to restore those rights. We would like some help for the establishment of a road map so that Palestinian workers may have decent jobs and can recover their rights. We would like the ILO to help us do so and create a fund for Palestinian workers. Ladies and gentlemen, we would like to thank all the delegates here present as well as the President. Thank you.

Mr Joseph Pitchay

Worker (Malaysia)

Mr President, Director-General and the members of the President's delegates, on behalf of the Malaysian workers I bring fraternal greetings for everyone. We are at a time in history where a shift is seen in the political, social, cultural and economic landscape. The people are revolting in many different ways. The political and economic status quo had deprived the common people of the world, that is the 99 per cent. We need to examine as to what is causing this revolt. The answers are not difficult to find, but they are being conveniently ignored. The global economic system has degenerated to a point where wealth and income inequality has been institutionalized. The rules are written in favour of the 1 per cent while the 99 per cent work to deliver for the benefit of that 1 per cent. The global financial crisis was thought to have taught the world a few lessons. It actually did and only that the lessons have been ignored. Taxpayers' monies were used to bail out banks where speculative practices caused the collapse of not just the industry but also the global economic system. Mechanisms were put in place to prevent the problem from reoccurring, such as Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act in the US in 2010. Today, the banks are lobbying ferociously to reel back on the provisions that would have to protect recurrence of the same economic fiasco. There is an imbalance in the global system of governance today that needs to be redressed. Globalization has failed the masses. It has resulted in the rise of the precarious employment practices, the dilution of trade union and collective bargaining rights, and many more. This has been institutionalized and is today a global phenomenon. It is the mainstay of the neo-liberal agenda that has taken over the system of global governance. Nation states have today less power than the major transnational corporations. CEOs are being positioned as leaders of the world, when in fact they do not represent the interests of the cross-section of the society and are mostly interested in profits. Institutions that are supposed to protect the poorer countries, such as the World Bank, has effectively strayed from its objectives. In a recent World Bank report, it is said to be promoting the ease of hiring and firing workers as a way forward to manage through the new economy. These global institutions have failed workers and the common people of the world. Trade unions need to play a more effective role and work towards reviving trade union activism. There is a need to fight against the institutional injustice, and it must be done at a global scale. ILO must look at ways and means to exert pressure on global institutions such as the World Bank and IMF to ensure that, as part of any economic agenda, the rights of the workers and the common people are safeguarded. Wages and trade union rights are being depressed through the process of globalization, and that has to be reversed. Regulation is the answer. Trade agreements have to incorporate labour chapters that would facilitate greater employment opportunities, prevent employment abuses of all kinds and increase the standard of living of people. This cannot wait, and the time to act is now. ILO mission to promote social justice for universal and lasting peace must not be at the expense of workers, as the imbalances and the inequality are widely visible among the 99 per cent. It is sad that, on the eve of the centenary, we are still disputing on regulating and negotiating for hours of work set out in the very first Convention, 1919, at the same we are contemplating to build the future of work. There is a need to revisit the existing mechanism in ILO. As we meet annually here, our fellow workers on the ground are blatantly robbed of their legitimate peace in their daily life. There is always hope. In Malaysia, people power prevailed very recently where a government of 60 years was replaced despite the many obstacles put in the way of change. The move towards restoring power in the hands of the people is becoming irresistible. We must work to make it happen. Thank you.

Government (Uzbekistan)

Dear Mr Chairman, dear ILO Director-General, dear participants of International Labour Conference, allow me first of all to express my gratitude. In Uzbekistan, employment and social and labour guarantees are one of the main priorities of the sustainable development of the country, which are defined in the Strategy of Action for the Five Priority Areas of Development of the Republic of Uzbekistan in 2017 - 2021, initiated by President Shavkat Mirziyoyev. This strategy provides for linking and growth of real incomes of the population. First of all of women, yes, as basis for ensuring the well-being of citizens and their families, ensuring employment of the population by creating opportunities for employable citizens to fully realize their labour and entrepreneurial activity, improving the quality of the workforce, expanding the system of vocational training, retraining and improve the qualifications of persons in need of employment. The practical implementation of these areas has found its expression in specific acts of legislation and actions taken in Uzbekistan recently. First of all, it's approved by a state programme of employment for 2018 providing for the mobilization of material and organizational resources for creation of more than 350,000 new stationary job places. In this regards, the Ministry of Employment and Labour Relations provides on the basis of a full analysis of the actual condition of the labour market formation of the state ordered for the creation of jobs and quotas for the employment of socially vulnerable sections of the population, as well as the active introduction of advanced information technologies in employment process. A fundamentally important and socially significant area of employment provision is active measures to stimulate the legislation of informal employment, organizing systematic work with temporary unemployment citizens, including view to a multiple increase in the financing of active measures in the labour market. In this direction, we plan the introduction of a multi-stage system of education, training evolution, selection and monitoring of employment by targeted employees, introduction of principles of public private partnership in the process of employment of the population, including abroad. Dear participants of the Conference, Uzbekistan notes the importance of the issues on agenda of the 107th Session of ILC, supports the initiative on the Future of Work, gender equality and just employment. In this regard, I consider that it's necessary to take into account the following specific proposals. First, providing advice and assistance in the ratification ILO Conventions designed to the legitimate interest of women and youth. Second, implementation of measures on employment of youth and women, the regulation of employment in the informal sector, monitoring of child and forced labour. Third, improvement of the activities of labour inspectors in the sphere of execution state control of observance of social and labour guarantees, including the field of implementation of forced labour. Thank you for your attention.

Mr Shahla

Government (Palestine Liberation Movement)

In the name of God the Merciful, the Compassionate, may I start by bringing the greetings of the State of Palestine to this ILO International Labour Conference. This was the first international organization, now celebrating its centenary year, and this was the first one in its Constitution to declare justice, just and sustainable peace, and the idea that social justice is fundamental. And the ILO has never ceased to struggle to make sure that disparities between social classes should disappear, that there should be justice for all the workers in the world. And this organization has always been the organization where those who are witness to the violation of these rules can come and bring their complaints. And this is the case of Palestine where there is injustice, where there is suffering for the children of the Palestinian people. And this is the 70th anniversary of the Palestinian Nakba, the occupation, on top of the decades which have passed since the blockade of Gaza began, strangling our people, and now we live through this occupation which is illegitimate, and the Palestinian people are paying a heavy price. It is they who are paying the price, particularly those who dare to have peaceful protests against these unjust practices, who advocate liberty and advocate the right to exercise their rights and their sovereignty over the territory of the State of Palestine with its capital in East Jerusalem. Israel continues to despoil our sacred places, to attack our clergy and to carry out violations of all our rights, and this has become even worse after the illegitimate and illegal annunciation of the American administration when they said that they would declare East Jerusalem as the capital of the State of Israel, and that they would take the American embassy and move it to East Jerusalem. Our Palestinian people protested, and the UN General Assembly also denounced this decision along with all the various summits. The Istanbul Islamic Summit, the Arab Summit which took place in Tehran, the European Union, the African Union Summit, the Non-Aligned Movement, they all denounced this decision, but Israel continues to kill Palestinians, the people of Palestine, their children, their elderly people, their women, their handicapped. Israel continues to hit out against Palestinian institutions and Palestinian enterprises. We cannot move freely with checkpoints and roadblocks everywhere. So ladies and gentlemen, remember what happened on 14 May, this month, 116 martyrs were killed, 3,000 people were injured. Women, children, workers, and they continue to be ill, badly injured. And there is all the administrative tension, the reconstructions that have been imposed upon freedom of movement for Palestinian workers. All this is to be found in the Report of our Director-General because, thanks to the direct contact mission, which finally was able to come to Palestine, all this information is now available, and I'd like to offer our thanks to the Palestinian Regional Office and the ILO itself for all the valuable support which they provide us. The Director-General came to Palestine last month, and a set number of agreements were established to provide social security for decent work, and we are trying therefore to uphold the hopes and aspirations of employers and of workers. There is 45 per cent unemployment in Gaza, 35 per cent in Jordan and in this respect, may I thank all stakeholders, all friendly countries, all brother countries for the help that they provide us, and this means that we are able to have a set number of programmes, including those proposed by Arab countries, to build capacity among the workers. Thank you for your attention.

Ms Restrepo Gallego

Government (Colombia)

Thank you, President. Good afternoon everyone. On behalf of my Government, and in my personal capacity, I wish to congratulate you on your appointment as Chair of the Conference, and of course, a warm welcome to all of your officers of this Conference. Furthermore, I'd like to note that the Conference for our nations, for workers and employers, has represented a great opportunity to reflect on work-related issues and to make an impact on important issues for our society. At the outset, I wish to express my appreciation to the Director-General for his report demonstrating the ILO's firm conviction to supporting gender equality in the workplace. As a woman, and the Minister of Labour for Colombia, of course, as a mother and as a civil servant, I wish to call for women's rights. World governments have come together to support women's opportunities in the workplace, ensuring greater opportunities for them, wage equality, equal pay for equal work and equal access to the workplace. Now this is a commitment for all of our governments. We've demonstrated that women are ready to step up to the plate. We have made progress through our work. We have built spaces where, day in and day out, we have demonstrated the importance of this very significant issue for us and for the ILO. Now in Colombia, we have made great progress in terms of quotas for women in the workplace. We have made significant headway on all issues, including women. Of course, work remains to be done, but we are promoting women seeking equal opportunities, which are so important for all of our nations. Now I'd like to note that these dynamic public policies have allowed us to work with the United Nations and the ILO in Colombia promoting an agenda called the Equipares, or Equality Agenda. This has allowed women to have better opportunities. Companies are committed to working with women to promote this very important initiative. The Ministry of Labour has also made progress on work-related issues when it comes to women. We have made improvements to working conditions. We have overcome wage gaps and ensured equality in the workplace. Greater and greater equality every day, ensuring that every person can be represented in the workplace. I now wish to refer to violence against women. I wish to underscore governments' commitments, especially the commitment of ILO Governments, to the issue of violence in the workplace. Today, the ILO is carrying out a very important and necessary debate, one which is necessary for women worldwide, and we wish you every success. Now I'd like to describe some progress in the workplace in Colombia. We've made progress in terms of oversight and inspection, significant progress in our country. This through a serious Labour Ministry commitment and agenda ensuring better conditions. Social dialogue has been a priority for our Government, and this is why I wish to thank the trade union federations here today and the employers who gave us the opportunity to truly build based upon consensus, building agreement and ensuring opportunities. Now that's not easy, but we are doing our utmost to ensure that this is possible. Now the peace process is a great opportunity to promote work-related agendas. We are working hand in hand with workers and employers to build an agenda based on better conditions, and this is especially relevant in Colombia. We have high levels of people working in the informal economy. We have the highest levels we've seen in 17 years in terms of employment in rural environments, and I wish to underscore the commitment of our Government, our trade union federations and our employers, a commitment to decent work for all, which will allow us to promote labour peace in the country. Thank you very much to each and every one of you. On behalf of Colombia, I wish to thank you for supporting our peace process, and I encourage you to come here tomorrow for the statement to be delivered by the President of the Republic. Thank you very much.

Mr Kadri

Worker (Syrian Arab Republic)

Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, let me start off by congratulating the President of the current session of the ILC, and on behalf of the Syrian workers we look forward to the upcoming era of the ILO, and we expect more hard work to accomplish the goals and missions of the ILO included in the Declaration of Philadelphia into a world of justice, social equality and social peace. Ladies and gentlemen, this session, the 107 Session of the ILC is taking place at a time of increasing threats and challenges facing labour workers, nations and peoples in general. Many of these dangers result from the efforts of nations and forces that want to keep the world under their control and act in various ways and means to perpetuate exploitation and abuse of human dignity, which has led to many serious and aggravating consequences of unemployment, social exclusion, famine and unregulated and indecent work. These matters have hindered the achievement of a just and equitable international order that would guarantee social peace, international security and safeguard the independence, sovereignty, dignity, rights and freedoms of states. Serious enemies have adopted terrorism as a way to invade our homeland. Over the past few years, hundreds of massacres have been committed in the midst of a suspicious international silence. When we confronted the terrorism and were close to achieve victory over it, western countries intervened militarily, and in mid-April launched a triple military aggression by the USA, France and Britain. They did this under false pretexts and fabrications made, as usual, by the so-called White Helmets that are masked by humanitarian clothes to fabricate lies against the Syrian Government in service of terrorist organizations. This blatant aggression was an attack on an independent state and a violation of the legitimacy of the United Nations. It is an aggression that continues daily with the presence of the US, France, Turkey in parts of Northern Syria with sanctions, embargos and unilateral actions, media war that aims at distorting facts and misleading public opinion about the reality of what is going on in Syria. It occurs in a clear blindness of what is happening in Syria. It is a war between the Syrian people and its Government. [vgr INTERRUPTION 3:09] Ladies and gentlemen, this war of aggression has left serious consequences for the Syrian citizen. We, in the Syrian working class have been targeted in our lives, facilities, workplaces and labour cities by terrorism. We have lost ten thousand martyrs and wounded workers. Thousands of our workers have become disabled or injured. Millions of workers have lost their work and their jobs in the private and public sectors. Millions of our national professionals and competencies have left the country because of fear of being hanged by terrorist groups. When we fight terrorism and aggression we exercise a legitimate right, guaranteed by the charter of the United Nations. We do so in self-defence of our nation and on behalf of all humanity because terrorism has become a danger to all. Those who finance and those who arm it should realize that it is a danger to all. In this context, our brave Syrian army is achieving more achievements in its fight against terrorism. The victories of our Syrian army have confined terrorist organizations, and we will be able to eradicate them with the support of our people. Ladies and gentlemen, last year has witnessed positive developments in our country in terms of restoring stability and security to large areas of the Syrian territory that were under the control of the armed terrorist organizations that were supported and financed and trained by colonial and reactionary powers. Thanks to the wisdom and foresight of our military leadership headed by President Mr Bashar al-Assad [vgr INTERRUPTION 5:05]. We have been able to accomplish many national reconciliation processes without bloodshed, restoring liberated areas to the authority of the state and the law, and in order to achieve what we have achieved in the eradication of terrorism and its final amputation. The Syrian State has given all legal guarantees for the return of those who were employed in terrorism, once they give up terrorism, to be engaged in the social society in peaceful efforts while we are optimistic that our army will continue to fulfil its security to protect the nation and unity and sovereignty of the people. ## Government (Uganda)

The President and Vice-Presidents of the Conference, the Director-General, Honourable Ministers, the social partners, ladies and gentlemen, Mr President, whereas International Labour Conferences are always held as a requirement of the ILO Constitution, each of the 107 conferences held since the founding of the ILO in 1919 has been different from the other in terms of focus and outcome. Some conferences have even had outcomes that are more outstanding, like the 26th conference held in 1944 is one such outstanding conference. It was at this conference that the Declaration of Philadelphia, which articulates the aims and purposes of the International Labour Organization, was adopted. The Declaration in part provides all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in the conditions and freedoms which with [vgr INAUDIBLE 3:45] of economic security and equal opportunity. However, the reality in the labour market remains a far cry from the aims and purposes of the ILO. For example, global unemployment is estimated at about 192 million people. The number of working poor in the developing countries stands at about 114 million people. Gender gaps are also a matter of concern. A woman is associated globally with 30 per cent less chance of being in the labour force and often being at the bottom of the economic ladder. Women continue to be paid approximately 20 per cent less than men per month across the world, even when they are engaged in the same work of equal value and pay. In addition, women are also more often subjected to violence and harassment at work. Unfortunately, although violence against women is widely acknowledged, few raise their voice. Others, because of conservative stereotype, see it as a harsh reality which has to be tolerated as part of life. I'm therefore pleased that the ILO is planting another pillar in history by having on its agenda an item for an international labour standard on ending violence and harassment at work. Uganda is also honoured to be the African spokesperson in the Standard Setting Committee on violence and harassment in the world of work. This honour, in our view, is in recognition of the many bold strides that our Government has taken in ensuring that gender equality is a [vgr INAUDIBLE 3:37] of meaningful national development. We look forward to ably representing Africa and to the overall fruitful deliberation in ensuring that violence and harassment at work ends. Let me also hasten to add that the international labour standard is important but not sufficient to end violence at work. Domestication and establishment of well-resourced and functioning institutions against violence at work should therefore follow standard setting. Furthermore, we must enable women to take their destiny in their hands through education, employment, creation and enterprise development. Let me also add that jobs do not simply happen. Jobs must be planned for. Governments therefore should mainstream employment creation in all their policies. Similarly, imbalances in asset ownership, especially land, should also be addressed. This is because when a male own and control land, access to finances will also be skewed in favour of men, yet capital is crucial for improvement of livelihood of women through enterprise development. In the same government, procurement is a lifeblood for the private sector. However, the majority of women are excluded from this business window. Governments should therefore give preferential consideration to women-owned enterprises in procurement as a measure of empowering women. Finally, Uganda welcomes the ILO initiative Women at Work, centenary initiative, which aims to better understand and deliver decent work for women in the 21st century. Thank you very much for listening, for God and my country.

Government (Zambia)

The President of the General Assembly, Mr Samir S Murad, the Director-General of the International Labour Organization, Mr Guy Ryder, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of the people of Zambia, allow me to join the international community in thanking the President of the General Assembly and the Director-General of the International Labour Organization for their inspirational address to the Conference. I also pay particular tribute to the speakers from the Employers, Workers and Government for ably highlighting the pertinent issues that require our collective resolve and determination to address and complement our efforts in sustaining what we have achieved over the years in the spirit of tripartism. I therefore reiterate the Director-General's call for delegates to show this spirit of tripartism, compromise and consensus, which, without doubt, as a condition of success for the Conference and of the ILO. Mr President, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, the Government of the Republic of Zambia wishes to place on record the importance that social dialogue continues to play in our development efforts. I therefore wish to stress that social dialogue gives people a voice and a stake in their societies and workplaces. The Zambian Government and its social partners will take this challenge very seriously by continuing to embrace social dialogue in its pursuit to implement reforms in the labour sector and in reviewing the attendant legislation. To make this happen we will require the continued support of the ILO in terms of sustainable development cooperation partnerships. Mr President, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, on workplace violence and harassment, the Director-General called on delegates to open the way for guarantees of workplaces entirely free of violence and harassment. This indeed is a welcome development. My Government is in full support of the call to make our workplaces safe and free from all forms of harassment and discrimination in line with the country's laws as well as values and principles outlined in the Constitution. In this regard, Zambia has a clear and comprehensive legislation that deals with all forms of violence and harassment in various situations including the world of work. The key legislation is the Anti-Gender-Based Violence Act of 2010 which provides for the protection of victims of gender-based violence, established of the Anti-Gender-Based Violence Committee and the setting up of the Anti-Gender-Based Violence Fund. I'm aware that consensus building is currently under way on a number of issues including concepts and definitions relating to violence and harassment in the world of work. These need to be debated thoroughly. Mr President, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, allow me to acknowledge the ILO Director-General's outlook of the future of work, which he said also means the future of the ILO. It is gratifying to note that the ILO has placed emphasis on The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality, as part of the agenda for the Future of Work, which calls for innovative action to close the persistent gender gap. I wish all of you a good success, and may God bless this conference. Thank you.

Government (Democratic Republic of the Congo)

Mr President, Director-General, Ministers, ladies and gentlemen, it is an honour to speak to you today on behalf of the Government of my country, the Democratic Republic of Congo, as well as on behalf of the tripartite delegation accompanying me, addressing this august assembly at this 107th Session of the International Labour Conference whose main theme is Building a future with decent work. I take advantage of this opportunity to address you to pass on the greetings of the people of my country and its President, and that to all delegates in this hall. Mr President, on behalf of the Government of the Democratic Republic of Congo, and in my own personal name, I would like to thank this organization which every year does battle to promote justice throughout the world of work. And I would like to congratulate you upon your brilliant election as an officer of this conference as well as to congratulate the other officers and also Mr Guy Ryder, Director-General of the ILO and Secretary-General of the Conference, for his excellent report entitled Report on ILO Programme Implementation 2016-17 as well as The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality. Mr President, I focus very carefully on the questions in reports 1A and 1B of the Director-General because they have such an influence on the world of work. In 2016 and 2017, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Welfare has benefited from the technical and financial support of this organization in drafting national policies for social protection and also assistance in promoting Recommendation 204 on the transition from the informal to the formal economy as well as education in the field of international labour standards. Our national social security fund also benefited from technical and financial support from the ILO in providing the support needed for the implementation of Law 16/009 of 15 July 2016, which enters into force in two months' time. As far as the Women at Work Initiative, the Constitution of my country, dated 18 February 2006, and which has been amended, has in Article 14 the principle of gender equality, and the authorities are required to ensure that all forms of discrimination against women are eliminated and also to ensure protection and promotion of women's rights. A special law and a piece of enacting legislation has been adopted and is being published in the official journal. Mr President, let me share with you some information of work we have done in my country in connection with the items on the agenda. International labour standards have greatly contributed to improving our national legislation. My Government is happy to announce that 16 implementing measures have been adopted for Law 16/009 of 15 July 2016, which establish the rules governing our social security system, and when I get back to my country I shall be convening a 35th Session of the National Labour Council to continue with further adoption of such measures. Moreover, I just organized, from 18 to 23 May 2018, the 34th Ordinary Session of the National Labour Council during which five implementing measures were adopted for ordinance 71-055 dated 26 March 1971, providing for provision of vocational training, and these are also soon to be signed and published in the official journal. These measures provide clear and structured information on existing certification, vocational certification, and that on the basis of standard criteria which serve both the interest both of the trainees who are striving towards such certification. It also serves the interest of those who design the certification and the training, namely all national authorities, certifying ministries, trainers, etc. In addition to this, three implementing measures relating to the law establishing the rules governing our general social security scheme were adopted. Mr President, the Democratic Republic of the Congo favours adoption of instruments ending violence and harassment in the world of work. In spite of the fact that our criminal code and our labour code both address the issues of violence and harassment, several cases have occurred, and it is difficult to remedy when such problems arise. These new instruments will help to improve national legislation in my country. My country, social dialogue and tripartism, we believe, are the best model of governance or mode of governance to promote social justice and equitable vocational labour relations and harmonious labour relations as well as to promote decent work. [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:17] I'm sorry, I cannot conclude without referring to our national plan for strategic development which was established on the basis of sustainable development aims for 2016-2022. And this national strategic development plan is currently being implemented.

Mr Cherry

Employer (Lebanon)

Thank you, sir. President, members of the Governing Body, Your Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen, we are here about to celebrate the first 100 years of this organization, which has always lived and challenged the wars that have taken place and the very far-reaching changes that have taken place throughout the world. This organization has always been a part of this change. It has adapted. It has contributed, and it has faced up to huge problems and continues to do so right up to today. We see proof of this in the firmness with which this organization is playing its part, a part which is destined to deal with conflict, be it economic or social conflict. And it has succeeded so often in lessening the threat of war, be it national level, economic warfare or international, even, warfare, because of the fact that there are rich and poor economies in the world and because of globalization, which has become uncontrollable, and which has broken down the barriers between rich and poor, between strong and weak. And this has even affected the rich countries, as we see in the economic problems faced by even the largest countries, as happened in 2008. And it is only direct intervention by governments that has managed to cope with some of these risks, which is the opposite of globalization. And this intervention has been of primary importance with all the trade barriers erected, which have returned to our world, the absolute opposite of free competition. There is, of course, a new approach, but I wish to speak of something different, the global deal which is circulating in the corridors of this organization, which is an attempt aimed at achieving a tripartite approach, the very idea behind this organization, where the role of the state, the role of governments is a very important role because it is they who arbitrate between the social partners. It is they who lay down economic and social policy, and development and investment policy, too. And recent experience has shown that this state, this government I mention, is very important, not just for the economy but for the social life of a country, too. This social aspect is just as important because only through that can we prevail against conflicts and divisions. And on the labour market there is a huge difference between rich countries with their technology and the poor ones, and this has enlarged the divide between different countries. It's investment which is needed to combat unemployment, and in the poor countries, which have enormous problems with unemployment, particularly youth unemployment, marginalization of large numbers of people, and also immigration problem and migration problems, too. So when we look at the programmes of the organization they would not be complete if they didn't take into account mechanisms, programmes and dialogue for social justice in the development division where we need to bring experts from the different countries who understand the economies and who understand, as academics in their country, what is at stake. Now I would like to request that the Conference adopt my language as an official language because for the Arabic-speaking countries it is a very important issue in terms of population, geography and so on. The organizations of the Arab countries work with the ILO in its various programmes and this is yet another reason to respond to our request. When we see... [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:06]

Government (Afghanistan)

Distinguished Chair, esteemed colleagues, ladies and gentlemen, it's a great honour to have the opportunity of speaking to you about our points of view regarding the agenda of our ongoing conference. At the outset, please allow me to congratulate the office on the release of the Programme Implementation Report for the 107th Session of the ILC. I had an opportunity to review this very useful paper, and I associate myself with the guiding principles and the strategic directions set out in the report. We are especially encouraged by the emphasis in the report on context specificity, efficiency, accountability, sustainability, inclusivity and result orientedness of our partnerships and interventions in the world of work. Allow me share some of our achievements in these matters with you. First, the labour rights. Dear colleagues, this year we were able to present to the national Cabinet and pass eight major labour-related regulations. The regulations will transform the way we manage our labour market and our relations with our social partners, workers and employers. The regulations are also an effort to ensure greater job stability and security for women employees, improve legal environment and social protection and work conditions for all workers. Furthermore, work on revision of the labour law is progressing well. Second, in the area of social protection, a key mandate of my Ministry, our first ever Child Act, which addresses all aspects of life of our children and envisages some of the strongest protection mechanisms, is at the Parliament, and we hope it will be passed very soon. Important policy and legal frameworks that guide our work on social protection of children include early child marriage prevention, anti-human trafficking, child abuse prevention, child labour protection, protection of children at risk, child correction and rehabilitation centres are embedded in this law. Third, under jobs agenda, we have embarked on a national whole-of-government approach with our partners to improve our employment outcomes and create the conditions to address the crippling challenge of unemployment. We believe national economic growth must be job-rich, and it must lift men and women out of poverty. This principle is strongly highlighted in our five-year National Peace and Development Framework. Fourth, in the area of human capital development, female labour force participation, as His Excellency Guy Ryder rightly mentioned in his statement, is an important trigger of economy enhancement. Unfortunately, currently women participation rate in Afghanistan is abysmally low, only 29 per cent. The Government has launched our first ever women economic empowerment national priority programme, a long-term, comprehensive flagship programme of the Government, which aims to fundamentally transform the social and economic status of women. The six components of the programme are all aimed at economic empowerment of women, of which labour market participation is a key element. The programme brings together at least 12 key sectorial ministries and our development partners and provide a national platform for coordinated national action on women's role in the economy. The programme is already delivering in all important sectors such as education, health, rural development, agriculture and also in eliminating binding constraints that impede women's participation in the market. Recently a national law passed on prohibition of women abuse and harassment at work, which entails the creation of a favourable work environment for women. At the end, let me reiterate our commitment to the effective implementation of labour and decent work promotion agendas and to improving our performance on the application of the ILO Conventions and Recommendations, particularly those we have ratified. I end by conveying to you the sincerest wishes and greetings of my Government and my people. I thank you.

Ms Pochinok

International Association of Economic and Social Councils and Similar Institutions

Sir, distinguished colleagues, thank you for this opportunity to speak and to say a few words about our view of what is happening at this session. In the world global market today, we have problems like not only youth unemployment but employment for people in the so-called third age. There is gender discrimination in employment. There are violations of what should be done by employers, conditions they should be supplying, illegal employment of migrants, delays in payment of wages and wage reductions, too. We find the old problems that used to be the case when the ILO was founded in 1919 are still existing in the digital age. Of course, they have changed, but by and large they remain the same in substance. In this context, an essential role belongs to social dialogue as an effective mechanism to overcome difficulties in the social and labour sphere, promoting social justice and minimizing negative effects of globalization. As always, we recognize the importance of the principles of tripartism to develop into subjective interaction on the labour market, including at this crisis juncture, and there are economic and social councils and similar institutions which have an important part to play as well. In Russia it is the Civic Chamber, which is a member of AICESIS. We are convinced that it's reasonable to use tripartite plus because this is the way in which we can encourage broader civic engagement, which would guarantee a balance of public interests. We are confident that this is what is required, and it fully coincides with the issue of labour rights protection. Now, when we're speaking of tripartism it is important to comply with the principles and standards of the ILO Decent Work Programme to increase the practical role of trade unions and provide comprehensive opportunities for small and medium businesses. Also, to finalize transitions from the informal to the formal economy, to implement innovative solutions in the field of social and labour relations. An example of such innovatory approaches in Russia is the so-called Open Government programme, which started in 2012 and has been prolonged to 2024. It is a system of mechanisms and principles providing effective interaction between government and civil society while accomplishing 15 steps towards the integration of public administration institutions into the modern digital economy. There is another innovative example, the International Ability movement, which organizes professional skills competitions for the disabled, providing people with disabilities vocational training, assisting their employment and integrating them into all the spheres of the life of society. For the past three years, this movement has blossomed in all the 85 regions of Russia. We are convinced that this Abilympics will significantly increase the number of disabled people who are economically active. The Russian State Social University, of which I am rector, is under contract to the State to develop the methodology and to organize events within the framework of the National Abilympics Championship, and we are delighted to share our experience with all our colleagues. On 7 May 2018 the President of the Russian Federation signed a decree entitled On National Goals and Strategic Tasks of the Development of the Russian Federation. This has many ambitious tasks including implementing the breakthrough scientific and technological social economic development for the Russian Federation, increasing the population of the country and improving the standard of living. Also, to create comfortable conditions for people to live in as well as the conditions and opportunities necessary for self-realization and for nurturing each individual's talent. This includes providing sustainable growth of real incomes for citizens, increasing life expectancy up to the age of 78, providing sustainable natural growth for the population as well as increasing the pension provision level above the level of inflation, halving the poverty level, improving living conditions for families, and providing an accelerated introduction of digital technologies in the economy and in the social sphere. All these initiatives cover various aspects of social development and ultimately focus on the active use of various mechanisms for international cooperation to build a sustainable society in which future generations will be able to have decent living conditions. Thank you for your attention.

UNI Global Union

Friends, I speak for UNI Global Union. We unite unions from 150 nations. Representing innovators, the skilled in services and sport. And looking to the Peruvian delegation, I am very happy to say, after the combined efforts of football unions and football unionists, that the captain of Peru, Paolo Guerrero can now play in the Russian World Cup. Thank you. We welcome the talks towards the Convention to stop violence at work. In this world we see too many fractures provoking political, economic, and indeed, corporate violence. This brings brutal economic injustice, the cannibalization of the wealth created by business through share buybacks stoking dividends and escalating CEO pay whilst wages remain stagnant. Economic violence against women with inequality in opportunity and pay. We want economic benefits for the many not the few. The political violence of closing democratic spaces, victimizing leaders and union members, and that is why we say, "Lula libre." Crushing freedom of association, closing down collective bargaining, and employers here manoeuvring to deny the global right to strike. Populists feed on these fractures, feed the haters and the xenophobes and the union busters. Where they claim to help workers and get into office, they quickly betray them. This breeds violent political reflexes. This endangers peace. The Doomsday Clock stands at two minutes to midnight, and we say, "No justice, no peace. No peace, no justice." Over half the world's workforce are in vulnerable jobs. Once, to have a job and wage meant a decent life. Today we have the global disease of being in work yet living in poverty. On the eve of the ILO centenary, we have a chance to put things right. I am proud to be a member of the ILO's Commission on the Future of Work. This is a commission about the future of social justice. The digital revolution would add trillions to our wealth. A richer not a poorer world, but for who? Wealth must be invested to bring inclusive growth. A new growth model based on investment in people, where no one is left behind. Where all businesses, all members of the IOE, from businesses in Silicon Valley to Bangladesh garment factories, pass the due diligence test. Where we call time on Uberization. Give rights to all workers. Access to skills throughout their lifetime. Where workers have a voice. Where we see a society and community at work, with social protection for all. Zero poverty, zero emissions and zero tolerance of those busting rights and unions. A world where union organizers can do their job free from fear. Where union negotiators can secure a social contract in every workplace for a living wage and for learning for all. Where social dialogue, fuelled by ideas like the global deal, brings an era of respect for dignity at work. This conference, like the world this year, must stand up for human rights, for trade union rights, for collective bargaining, for sectorial collective bargaining and social dialogue. I have to say, Chairperson, this is unusual for me to say things like this, but I am dismayed at the International Organisation of Employers in opposing the global deal. You are not standing up for union rights. You're putting your head in the sand, your rear end in the air. And with all due respect to ostriches, it is not a pretty sight. I ask the IOE to think again, and also to understand the global agreements and framework agreements which we negotiate are the future of labour relations, and you should not be in fear of them. Our world congress is in two weeks' time in Liverpool. It is the city where you never walk alone, under the theme of making it happen. We need an ILO for the people, for social justice, for responsible business. You too must be making it happen in the spirit of the Declaration of Philadelphia. As the ILO enters its second century, an organization that was born out of war and the cruelties, the social cruelties of the industrial revolution, we must stand up for a stronger ILO as the bedrock of social progress and peace. Thank you. And all the best to Peru. Thank you.

International Domestic Workers Federation

Good afternoon everybody. I want to thank you for the opportunity and thank you all for being here. My name is Myrtle Witbooi, and I'm the General Secretary of the South African Domestic Workers Union in South Africa. I am also the President of the International Domestic Workers Federation, which includes migrant workers, urban workers and rural workers. So much has been said the last couple of days on violence in the world of work, but at looking at a domestic worker's rights, they find themselves open to abuse daily in the privacy of the employer's house. Many domestic workers are isolated away from their families as they have to work to provide for their children for education. However, that does not mean that domestic workers should be abused by their employers. Therefore, the International Domestic Workers Federation, together with other organizations, should lead a strong campaign to stop the gender-based violence for all workers in the world. Our presence here is to make sure that the voices of the domestic workers are heard, that the pains of the domestic workers are felt. And we feel that it will touch your conscience, that you cannot refuse to vote for the Convention with strong Recommendations. This will show domestic workers that they are recognised as workers that contribute to the economy of the country. This is why we need a strong Convention accompanied by Recommendations. We don't need watered-down Recommendations. We want strong Recommendations, to address the abuse of workers in the world, including those working in the private homes, such as domestic workers. Just as 2011 was history for domestic workers, with Convention 189, let 2018 be the start of freedom from abuse of domestic workers. I thank you all.

Ms Prenger

International Young Christian Workers

Dear ILO delegates. Thank you very much for giving me the floor. I am speaking to you on behalf of the International Young Christian Workers. Thanks a lot also to all actors who are involved in the process which is described in the report of the Director to achieve dignified working conditions all over the world. Thanks a lot for this. However, in our daily grass-root experience, young workers do not have the impression that our working conditions get better. We experience flexibilization and precarization of work, as well as growing youth unemployment. Here I have just two voices of young workers from today, but they reflect situations of thousands of young workers. "Every day I go to an employment agency to find a stable job. I am now working with day contracts, but sometimes it is not even a day contract because I only work for three hours. Sometimes they inform me one hour in advance that I have to work. I would like to work somewhere where I also have rights such as vacation and free time." That is from a 24-year-old from Belgium. "My name is Mario, and I am 19 years old. I work for a company that does house interviews in the Dominican Republic. It is a semi-formal job. I have a contract and also a fixed work schedule, but I don't have social security. I have been working for a month and a half, and I still did not receive my first salary, and I don't know, actually, who is my boss, in order to claim it. There are people who tell us where to do the interviews, but it is always different people, and they move regularly." So, young workers in the world face informal and precarious work. Currently, even new forms of work arise that increase even more the precariousness. The consequence is an immense insecurity in our lives. Simultaneously, we experience huge inequalities, and they are based on gender, nationality, ethnic and social background. Social protection is lacking as is also said in the report. About 55 per cent of the people worldwide are left unprotected, including the young. Social protection lacks, and even where it used to be strong, it is gradually decreasing due to austerity and precarization of work. Experiencing all this insecurity, we keep hearing everywhere that money would be lacking. There is not enough money to ensure just salaries. There is not enough money to ensure sufficient labour protection. There is not enough money to employ young workers who are needed in so many fields today, and there is no money to ensure social protection for all. So since we are hearing this we are actually wondering where the money is? The world needs the equal distribution of wealth and the respect of all human rights. Young people need job security. No young worker must be replaced by machines. Our founders strongly defended the human dignity. Young workers are not slaves, no animals, no machines, but persons and children of God. It is following this message that IYCW is acting today. So, seeing these aspirations and this reality, and seeing this huge gap in between, we keep wondering about many questions. And some of these questions I mentioned here, for the discussion by the duly respected Governments, trade unions, Employers' association and NGOs in the platform of the ILO and the UN. We ask them also in relation to the SDGs, since we are living connected in all this globalized world, why don't we have a global minimum tax on assets? The income could contribute to social protection for all. Why there is no tax for digital enterprises in the countries where they are operating? And how can the respect of all labour rights be guaranteed in every country? So this includes the question how to guarantee the concrete implementation of all the ratified ILO Conventions in every country, and even at the base, and even at the grassroots? Together with you, we act in order to achieve just work, equality and dignity for all young workers, and thanks a lot for your attention.

International Catholic Migration Commission

Good afternoon Mr President, delegates. Let me start by thanking you for this opportunity. International Catholic Migration Commission (ICMC) is honoured to deliver this statement at the 107th Session of the ILC in response to the Report of the Director-General. ICMC is a registered non-profit organization providing direct humanitarian and other services to uprooted people and advocating for and with them. It coordinates a network of Catholic Bishops Conferences worldwide and has staff and programmes in over 50 countries. ICMC's mission is to protect and serve refugees, asylum seekers, internally displaced people, victims of human trafficking and migrants, regardless of faith, race, ethnicity or nationality. Furthermore, ICMC contributes to enhance sustainable development for refugees and migrants through vocational trainings and livelihood programmes. The organization plays a key advocacy role regarding refugee and migrants' rights, which is increasingly recognized by states and international organizations such as the ILO, IOM and UNHCR. For example, ICMC coordinates the global society contribution of 200 organizations to an important intergovernmental process called the Global Forum on Migration and Development (GFMD). Relevant issues currently invading the world of work are being discussed at the ILC this year. And we are particularly attentive to the following topics. Cooperation for sustainable development, violence and harassment at work, and gender-based violence. ICMC believes that effective and positive cooperation with the ILO, in support of the Sustainable Development Goals should be based on trust and collaboration from local to international level. We would like to share an example of effective collaboration, which is a global project called The Future of Work, Labour After Laudato Si. This proposal brings together different stakeholders, from international movements to local communities, as well as organizations from different religious traditions. This project is the continuation of a five-year collaboration at the global level related to the SDGs, and it will also aim to contribute to the ILO centenary and the Future of Work Initiative. In Malaysia, Pakistan and Jordan, ICMC supports local and refugee individuals and families who have experienced sexual or gender-based violence. As a case in point, since 2010 ICMC works within Burmese refugee communities to prevent and respond to sexual or gender-based violence, especially by improving access to emergency support services, safe shelter, medical care and counselling for refugee woman and children in Malaysia. Moreover, ICMC funds community-based organizations, including two support centres for Rohingya women to implement different activities to focus on raising awareness on this topic. In the context of the ILC, ICMC considers the following aspects to be of particular relevance in the present situation in regard to violence and harassment at work and gender-based violence. Number one, we are keenly aware and deeply concerned that women, despite their equal dignity with men, regularly are confronted with inequitable, discriminatory and stigmatizing policies and practices in the world of work, and in other socio-economic arenas without access to legal protection and complaint mechanism. Number two, we expect that the efforts of the ILC conclude with endorsement of an ILO Convention, accompanied by a Recommendation with a strong focus on the general dimension as a first step to change the narrative for women and men throughout the world. Number three, we are convinced that woman workers, especially those particularly vulnerable as migrant workers in the informal economy, should be placed at the centre of sustainable development policies and should be the first concern in the reflection and debate on violence and harassment in the world of work. Lastly, we believe that when it comes to global value chains, the responsibility of the business sector together with the advocacy of civil society organizations should be one of the main discussions. Companies have a responsibility to eliminate violence and harassment in the workplace in their own value chains, and governments should ensure that they enact and support programmes to tackle violence against women and men. Let us join forces and advance together to the future we want. Thank you very much, Mr President.

Ms Sibanda

StreetNet International

Everyone, on behalf of StreetNet International, I would like to say all protocol indiscriminately observed. Thank you for this opportunity for StreetNet to speak on behalf of workers in the formal economy the world over. StreetNet International is an international federation of 52 organizations of street vendors, street hawkers and informal economy workers in 47 countries found in the continents of Africa, the Americas, Asia and Europe. It represents more than 550,000 members. My name is Lorraine Sibanda. I am from Zimbabwe, and I am the StreetNet International President. StreetNet represents one of the most vulnerable categories of workers who engage in the informal economy as a means of livelihood and survival in a world of increasing informality and precariousness of work as employment opportunities continue to shrink daily. This organized representation is a result of building collective voice to fight and address the ever visible challenges we face daily as informal economy workers, such as daily evictions and harassment by police and local authorities, lack of legal and social cover, and lack of safety and security nets, lack of decent working conditions, and lack of political will from governments to recognise us as workers. Working in the informal economy is not a choice. It's a need to survive. It is not a crime and informal economy workers are not criminals. Informal economy workers are the majority of workers across the Global South yet highly vulnerable to violence and harassment due to the high status of employment, non-regulation and lack of protection. It is important to also note that the informal economy is mainly women-dominated, which includes persons with disabilities and other marginalized groups in the sector. StreetNet believes that a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation which recognises and addresses all forms of violence and harassment in the world of work will be an historical achievement for the ILO and this International Labour Conference of 2018. Therefore, the instrument has to include provisions to protect all workers, formal and informal, to ensure zero discrimination. It's time for the ILO Tripartite bodies to show the world their commitment towards combating violence and harassment in the world of work without excluding the informal economy, to make sure that no one is left behind. StreetNet also commits to play its role to stop repeated violence and harassment against all workers at their workplaces, and we can definitely achieve it if we unite our strengths and work in cooperation with each other. With reference to adapting tripartite structures to become more inclusive, in the years since StreetNet was first accredited to attend the ILC in 2004 we have made many efforts to get recognition for the right of informal economy workers to be directly represented by their own democratically-elected negotiators in collective negotiations with the appropriate negotiation counterparts who hold power over their working conditions. And these are not employers but authorities such as local government authorities. However, our experience is that incumbent representatives of the traditional employed workforce are not yet ready to grasp the challenge of establishing new types of bargaining forums, which are more representative of the workers in the informal economy and new forms of work, least of all self-employed workers. The whole world is work is rapidly changing. [vgr INTERRUPTION 5:42] Thus this type of dialogue must equally adjust to the change. It is high time informal economy workers are found at the table and not on the table, and I would like to take us to the picture of the broken chair outside. The current set-up depicts the broken chair, which is a symbol of fragility and strength, precariousness and stability, brutality and dignity. It invites each one of us to denounce what is unacceptable. To stand up for the rights of individual... [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:20]

African Union of Mutual Entities

Vice-President of the Governing Body, Director-General of the ILO, ladies and gentlemen, distinguished participants, it's with a sense of honour and legitimate pride that I stand before you again to give you an account of the challenges faced by the mutual fund system in Africa and say something about Africa's aspirations in this respect. We have the grand ambition of seeing this session establish a system in Africa which will provide the necessary preconditions for enterprises to be able to develop and grow, and also to contribute to improving GDP and creating jobs, which is the only way to combat poverty, exclusion and precariousness. It is self-evident that mutual entities represent, support and solidarity, along with mutual help, and they contribute as a pillar of the social and solidarity economy to increasing and improving the amount of cover citizens have. In Africa, exclusion from social welfare protection is particularly a matter for concern given the extent of our poverty. Successive economic crises have led to governments disengaging from the struggle, which means less public money going in to social welfare. The health sector's been one of those most effective and so often cover for all is not guaranteed. The service has to appeal to users to contribute. Bridging the gaps in cover is a major problem, and the ILO's figures show that 82 per cent of Africans live without any social welfare protections, which is a significant obstacle to eliminating poverty and reducing inequality. Ladies and gentlemen, I don't have to tell you that the desire for consolidation is part of this dynamic towards mutual funds promoted by NGOs working in the field, and this has meant that the African Union for Mutual Funds was set up with its headquarters in the capital of Morocco, Rabat. This organization is behind the drive to create a network for mutual funds organizations, entities, and in Africa this is an instrument for coordinating and offering such technical assistance as is appropriate. Our organization includes several mutual funds and federations belonging to 20 member countries and 12 signatories. One of the founder members, Morocco, is thanks to the visionary initiatives of His Majesty the King supporting this movement. And there are two regimes in the obligatory health insurance that was launched in 2005. There's the obligatory regime for full-time salaried staff and retired people, for students and freelance workers, and then there's the medical assistance regime, for the poor and those on very low incomes. Ladies and gentlemen, it's clear that mutual entities are at the heart of the welfare system, and they are one of main players in social and solidarity economy. However, mutual entities are living in an age of far-reaching changes, and they have to face these changes if they are to endure and prosper. Given this, and given the fact that they have to face such problems, the UAM, our organization, has been holding workshops on governance for mutual entities in Africa, like the one that took place on 1 and 2 December in Rabat in Morocco, and has adopted the Rabat Declaration on Mutual Funds Governance. Ladies and Gentlemen, extending medical cover is a priority for all nations, as witnessed in the SDGs for 2030, and also in the national Social Protection Floors of the ILO. Moved by the desire to reconcile the principles of fairness and social justice with economic development and to progress social welfare cover, the Organization of Mutual Entities of the Americas took the initiative, along with our organization, to create The World Union of Mutual Entities, which will be launched here on 5 June, at the United Nations in Geneva. These bodies have worked together since 2010 to develop and unify the mutual funds organizations of the world, and this is contributing to promote the social and solidarity economy and to provide good organization for mutual entities which are called upon not only to support the health sector but also in agriculture, fishing, tourism, education, micro-credit, and so on. All in all, it is important to stress that mutual funds are essential for the success of any social regional project in order to deal with geographical inequalities and to provide better connectivity between the different parts of our countries, which is important for solidarity within nations and geographical areas. Thank you.

Mr Sigliano

Organization of Mutual Entities of the Americas

Thank you, Chair. Delegates, yet again, ODEMA, the Organization of Mutual Entities of the Americas representing the American mutual system has the opportunity to address this honourable conference to reiterate our commitment to the ILO's objectives as well as our endorsement of these objectives. Of course, I also wish to congratulate the Director-General for his excellent report. In line with the UN's guidelines on the Sustainable Development Goals, our organization, as part of its jurisdiction which is closely tied to the social and solidarity economy, has demonstrated its commitment to these essential objectives, such as decreasing poverty, gender equality, climate change and decent work. To this end, we have put in place a joint action strategy. We have set up specific working groups such as ODEMA Women, ODEMA Adults, ODEMA Native Peoples and the ODEMA Youth Network, which are all very relevant for the American mutual entities landscape. In 2008, the ILO adopted the Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization. Since then, reflecting the true nature of the mutual benefits system, whose solidarity makes it a lynchpin of the social solidarity and formal economy, ODEMA has embraced the four pillars of this statement. Indeed, we fully agree with its goals of ensuring a decent standard of living for all peoples all across this planet, which is the very raison d'être of the mutualism system. In the same vein, we endorse the steps to be taken to ensure social justice in all its forms. We note that, as regional and international organization, the ILO must do its utmost to promote decent work and compliance with labour legislation in every respect in the American communities. Likewise, we could note, and do note, that the mutual system is the epitome of effectively applied social justice, in light of the various services it provides to the families that are its members, which are paramount in ensuring decent lives for all people in these communities where mutual funds are active, promoting sustainable beneficial solutions. These views are based on the goal of promoting solidarity and embracing the concepts and principles of the mutual system which put human beings first and foremost, front and centre, with a view to serving society.

ODEMA is attending this 107th Conference at a time where we've seen an unprecedented occurrence in the international mutual system. Indeed, on June 5, from 1 p.m. to 3 p.m. in Room 8 of the Union Nations in the Palais des Nations we will be holding the General Assembly of the UMM, the World Mutualism Union. Now this union brings together the bodies supporting mutualism from the far flung corners of the world, starting with Africa, the Americas, and Europe. I also wish to note the partnership dating back over a decade between the UAM, the African Union for Mutualism, and my body, ODEMA. Now these two bodies have similar views and, based on the UN's South-South cooperation programme, we have for the first time ever been able to address, or rather announce, the upcoming launch of the World Union of Mutual Entities in this very hall. Finally, on behalf of the American mutualism system, ODEMA wishes to reiterate it's firm commitment to promoting and advancing the goals and aims of the ILO. Thank you very much.

International Kolping Society

Mr President, distinguished delegates, I am grateful for this opportunity of speaking on behalf of the Kolping International. We have more than 400,000 members in over 60 countries, and I am very grateful for this opportunity to comment on the Director-General's Report. The majority of people all over the world work in informal, and sometimes extremely precarious, working conditions. The ILO debates on the importance of the informal economy in 2001 and 2002 helped to draw attention to this. It is therefore an excellent sign that this year's report mentions companies from both the informal and formal economy when it comes to presenting the employment potential and the corresponding employment policy. Decent work and poverty reduction must go hand in hand in the ILO's work. The ILO's initiatives on poverty reduction, on green employment, and now also on women in the world of work, bear witness to this. The ILO is on the right way, and this is also noticed by the public. It's important and it's right that the ILO has recaptured its way back to the negotiating tables of politics and business, and we must continue along this path. The negotiations on the rights of domestic workers were a breakthrough for the recognition of informal workers in the negotiations. These negotiations open up a window onto new ways of involving stakeholders who do not appear in the classical tripartism. Not all workers and not all self-employed people are represented by the social partners today. We welcome success achieved by the ILO over the past two years in strengthening social dialogue instruments in many member countries, as well as supporting governments, including by introducing dispute resolution mechanisms and promoting labour inspection for the implementation of ILO instruments such as R202 and R204 on Social Protection Floors and on the transition from the informal to the formal economy. The involvement of further stakeholders is rightly seen as necessary. However, we do miss a critical approach to the problem that social dialogue is being cut back in some member States, allegedly in order not to hinder economic competitiveness. This, together with the phenomenon of shrinking space for civil society organizations, is a cause for concern. As the guardian of tripartism, the ILO has to be careful at the negotiating tables of the UN, the Paris Agreement, the Global Compact on Migration, the G20, the WTO, Bretton Woods organizations, to ensure that these spaces for participation and company-determination don't become ever narrower. The Director-General's Report also highlights the ILO's efforts to enter into dialogue with others. We also expressly welcome this, especially as the joint international conference of ILO, Caritas Internationalis, and then the Pontifical Council Justitia et Pax on Sustainable Development and the Future Work in 2016, was an encouraging signal for us. The declaration of commitment with the action plan adopted on 5 May 2016 gave us an opportunity to combine the sustainability goal 8, Decent Work of the Agenda 2030, with the goal of overcoming social, ecological and economic crises of which Pope Francis is speaking. In order to meet the severe and dangerous challenges of the globalized economy and the world of work, further development of the social dialogue is necessary. A look at the FAO, which with its Committee for Food Security has established an advanced stakeholder approach, could help in this context. Tripartite social dialogue actors must also be aware of the benefits of civil society involvement. The legitimation and enforcement of the results of this dialogue will be greatly simplified. None of the three partners will be able to achieve the objectives of the Decent Work Agenda without, or even against, civil society. We expressly offer you cooperation. Use our common strength to implement and enforce the important labour standards. One of the global challenges is the violence at workplace, which is being discussed here. We expressly welcome the standard-setting process in this respect. Kolping International feels connected with other Catholic organizations in the willingness to be a dialogue partner in this process and in the future. Thank you very much.

Confederation of Workers of Universities of the Americas

Good afternoon ladies and gentlemen. Thank you, Chair. I speak on behalf of CONTUA, the Confederation of Workers of Universities of the Americas. This is a trade union organization bringing together 23 federations from 18 Latin American countries, organizing non-teaching staff, technical staff, administrators and service providers from Latin American universities. At this opportunity we are pleased to note that a new member, FATUN, the Argentinean Federation of National University Workers has joined us. Now, FATUN organizes 56 trade unions in the four corners of its country. Mr President, we are facing worldwide crises, a global crisis which especially affects those who has the least, workers and those who cannot find jobs. We are seeing a flare-up of individualism. We are seeing capitalism rearing its ugly head as individuals seek to maximise revenue with no view to just, social development. We are seeing unemployment rates on the rise, and we are seeing greater inequality between the haves and have-nots. Pockets of poverty are widespread and management is not providing answers. We are seeing crises of political representation that do not distinguish between developed and developing countries. Now we are discussing setting up an international standard on violence and harassment in the world of work today. At CONTUA, we are firmly in favour of gender equality. We support the adoption of a Convention and Recommendation protecting workers from all forms of harassment in the workplace. We also endorse all initiatives which promote equality and pay equity, which combat unfounded discrimination and which incentivize measures which boost greater participation of women and youth in the workplace. This generation of managers, our generation, has an opportunity to build a better future for the generations to come. If we manage to overhaul the manufacturing and consumption systems to combat the damages to our ecosystem due to climate change, and to promote a more just economy based on the ethical view of guaranteeing sufficient income for all people to guarantee, and decent conditions, then we will have made great progress. In the run up to the centenary conference, the Director-General called upon us to discuss the future of work against the backdrop of Economy 4.0. Now we must, in universities, engage in these discussions as supported by PSI. Now when this debate started, we were concerned. We hoped that governments and employers would bear in mind the seriousness of the global situation, avoiding frivolous viewpoints that might aim to solely focus on the impact of technology, computers and new forms of work. For the social sector, discussing the future of work also means discussing free, high quality public education, a distribution of income, decent wages, and labour rights. Chair, in Latin America the situation is rather gloomy, in fact we are seeing a wave of governments aiming to dismantle protective policies. We are seeing regressive political views, and this is reflected in increased poverty, decreased purchasing power and growing gaps in wealth distribution. These are examples which we can see in the Americas. A few examples are the freezing of education and public services budgets in Argentina and Brazil. Mexico is seeing risks of constant violations of human rights, especially labour rights, a latent threat due to the imposing of a labour counter reform, and in some cases, such as the Intercultural University of Chiapas, Michoacán, Querétaro and rural primary schools, we are seeing these institutions being eliminated. Now we extend our solidarity to all of these workers. Chair, in the upcoming days, we will hold the Regional Higher Education Conference in Latin American and the Caribbean. This is organized by UNESCO against the backdrop of the university reforms in Córdoba in 1918. At this time, CONTUA wishes to reaffirm our commitment to higher education as a public good, a fundamental human right, which must be guaranteed by states to ensure access for all on equal footing with equal opportunities. In 2019, the very same model shall be ours as we come before the UNESCO summit to share the views of workers, non-teaching staff. In conclusion, I wish to pay tribute to the students who bore the standard of reform in Córdoba in 1918. Their call for freedom lit the flame that shed light on all universities in Latin America as they called for progressive, structural changes at the time. Today, this call for rights and freedoms is more relevant than ever. In fact, we can see this summarized in the motto, namely, the pains that remain are the freedoms we lack. Thank you.

Ms Iglesias Escobar

Women in Informal Employment: Globalising and Organizing

Officers, delegates, members of workers' and employers' organizations. My name is Martha Elena Iglesias Escobar. I am from Columbia. For over two decades I have represented recycling sector workers in my country. Today I speak on behalf of the millions of workers in the informal economy worldwide. In fact, this represents nearly 70 per cent of workers in developing countries. We are those who most frequently see violence and harassment in our workplaces. As a result, in this conference, it is crucial that we be borne in mind in drafting this Convention and Recommendation. I represent the recycling sector workers. There are over 20 million such workers worldwide. We work in your streets. We work in landfills, and we remove glass, paper, cardboard, plastic, metal and other discarded objects from trash. Yet these objects support our families. Historically, society has discriminated against us. Many times, as we walk the streets passers-by have avoided us. Indeed, they associate us with crime, with poverty, or the waste that we handle. Worse yet, we have been abandoned and prosecuted by the authorities of our cities, and by our national governments, despite the fact that our work is beneficial for all, supporting our environments, our economies and our societies. In many countries worldwide our brothers and sisters working in this sector work in landfills that are run by mafias who impose working conditions for them. At times they demand sexual favours in exchange for a work permit. The situation is even worse if we are migrants, and you can imagine how bad it is if we are also women. We see violence and harassment in streets and in landfills, which are our workplaces. Many individuals are responsible for this violence. Though we are excluded, we know that as workers in the informal sector we are part of the solution to the problems that our societies face. In order to defend our rights we have come together in unions across the world. In Latin America we set up the Latin American and Caribbean network of recycling sector workers, including 16 countries in Central and South America. In my country we set up the National Association of Colombian Recycling Sector Workers. We have seen such shameful situations as those that took place in 1992 in Barranquilla. At the time, 11 recycling workers were brutally assassinated with the knowledge of staff from the faculty of medicine at the Free University of Barranquilla. Indeed they sold their organs and bodies for academic purposes. The State of Columbia was convicted for this massacre, yet the intellectual authors, the perpetrators of this crime, were never brought to justice. This led our sector to not only have to fight for their rights to life but also for their rights to work. This amidst neo-liberal policies, which systematically attacked our forms of organizing based on social and community principles. Worse yet, these politicians tried to hand over the source of our income, namely access to waste. They gave it to private enterprises, and they made our jobs criminal. For example, they have banned our free movement. They have stopped us from picking up waste in the public spaces, and through the police forces the State has become responsible for violence in our workplaces. Today, after 30 years of fighting in Columbia, we have seen seven verdicts issued by the honourable Constitutional Court defending our work. We must be recognised in every municipality in every city in our country as recycling sector service providers. Even better, we must be remunerated for these services. These successes should extend to all recycling sector workers worldwide. Regardless of where we are, we contribute to the health of our cities and provide a public service to our societies. Despite these successes, some local governments in Columbia, such as in Rionegro in the north of Antioquia have forced us to compete on unequal footing in the streets with private enterprises who are motivated by remuneration that they receive for the service we provide. As a result they have turned out into the streets. They have displaced us. They have taken away recycling, and they are kicking us out of our workplaces. Let us recall that rubbish is to recycling sector workers as land is to farmers or rivers are to fishermen. We believe that the potential Recommendation and Convention could serve as a mechanism to mitigate violence and harassment against informal sector workers. This also could represent an instrument to ensure that recycling sector workers worldwide, and those in Columbia can truly enjoy the rights which were granted to us by the honourable Constitutional Court. We call on national authorities... [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:43] Let us not forget, recycling without recycling sector workers is quite simply rubbish. Thank you very much.

Mr Hemsani

Latin American Union of Workers in Control Organisms

Chair, brothers and sisters, I speak on behalf of ULATOC and the society as a whole, who, on the global stage, have called for protection for our citizens. Now we aim to fight corruption to ensure equal tax treatment and justice. These are basic pillars of trade union actions to promote a sustainable, fair, inclusive development model. This through defending decent work for workers, who are key stakeholders in improving the quality of institutions and governance. Our members are the first responders. They can optimize public management, avoiding damage to the state. Yet, as they do so, often they face harassment, simply because they are promoting the common good. ULATOC, my organization, alongside the ICJ workers' network, and in partnership with PSI, condemns corruption in all forms as it undermines trust in governments. It weakens public policies. It affects economic and social development and jeopardizes decent work for workers. It weakens democratic institutions and contributes to the greatest inequality we all face today. Our workers are whistle-blowers, qualified whistle-blowers who are simply blowing the whistle in line with their jobs. Now, as part of their jobs they have access to information related to management of public policy. As a result, they are in an excellent position to raise the alert and prevent any type of harm to promote efficient transparent management. Now, in this sector, workers face a kind of harassment we call objective workplace violent, OWV. This is a new form of harassment that we must address. Now, we define this as any type of psychological harassment, persecution, physical violence, moral or inequality. These individuals play a key role in fighting corruption, a lack of transparency, and promoting fair tax treatment. As demonstrated in PCI's report, Checkmate to Corruption, this violence is not specific to one region or culture, rather it is worldwide, and it directly affects 7 per cent of the global workforce. The results of this violence are felt first and foremost by these workers, but it also affects citizens as a whole because they receive poor public services, low quality services and indeed weak governance. Now we have brought this to the attention of this trade union alliance since 2009, and we've managed to really make this front and centre for the ILO. We promote and encourage them to carry out an international study on this. Now we have also put forward national legislation to include these protections to ensure an effective global standard. In fact, corruption and tax evasion are issues that affect the world as a whole, and as a result, they call for global measures in the form of an ILO standard. ULATOC, ISP and ICJ support these whistle-blowers. As a result, we set up a global alliance to promote these goals. Against this backdrop, the ILO can and must play a key role in stressing the importance of states, trade unions, and workers who must participate from the outset and defend the rights of whistle-blowers, setting up social tripartite dialogue and launching an initiative which serves as a standard setting benchmark in defending trade union and labour rights. Until such safeguards are in place, the violence that workers that face can truly weaken all other workers. At present, the ILO has no standards bearing in mind protection for these key workers, ensuring the efficacy and transparency of governance. As a result, it is of the utmost importance for such a standard, which safeguards good governance, to be put in place. This will protect not only decent work for these workers but society as a whole. If we are truly concerned about combating corruption and tax injustices, we must more staunchly protect these rights. We look forward to the ILO's centenary next year, and we note that this is an unprecedented opportunity to forge a new path and appropriate standards to ensure that workers worldwide can serve the public interest while working to build a better world. Finally, we also wish to express our solidarity to workers and trade unions here in the ILO trade union. Thank you very much.

Government (Austria)

Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I am very pleased that the ILO, as it approaches its 100th anniversary, is giving priority to the quest of equality for women. The analyses in the report are in a large part true also for Austria. The proposal in Chapter 5 for the organization of the Century Initiative are also extremely relevant in terms of the problems we face in Austria. In Austria, too, we still have gender stereotype problems, and for many women it is very difficult to combine job and family. Often it is a question of childcare, and school does not last all day. Many women, therefore, work part time, and that is a very common phenomenon, but that does not necessarily provide a high standard of living, and of course it has an effect on pensions. The gender pay gap in Austria is still relatively high. The reasons for that are the very segregated labour market and the fact that women in a number of sectors are very badly paid, such as in the care professions. Social dialogue is therefore extremely important because collective agreements have to move away from their habit of concluding pay agreements for sectors which are regarded as typically for women. In Austria, we have anonymous income reports from companies employing more than 150 people, but since most Austrian companies are very small, more than half of the population are not covered by these provisions. Care work is in Austria carried out to a large extent, and this is also true of people from outside Austria who work in our country. It is necessary to make a significant effort to bring about more equal working conditions. It is primarily women who work in the care sector; there are relatively few men. Austria is attempting to change this and has introduced an income-dependent parental pay bonus and increasingly men are taking up this bonus, and this is a step towards achieving more financial independence and economic independence for women. In addition, innovative working conditions, both in terms of time and in terms of location, can help to close the pay gap between men and women. With regard to the involvement of women in decision-making, I point out that in Austria, since the beginning of this year, we have had a law which stipulates that 30 per cent of seats on works councils in large companies must be occupied by women. With regard to violence against women, there is a great deal of work to be done. Austria has a relatively good legal framework and has ratified the Istanbul Convention of the Council of Europe on prevention of violence against women and domestic violence. We therefore expressly welcome it that there is a standard setting initiative directed at violence in the workplace. Even though the ILO mentions the question of equality of income in Chapter 4 there is still a long road to travel. With regard to the provisions in Chapter 5 of the report, Austria supports the concept of time sovereignty, fair appraisal of women's work and also the measures for more decision-making and representation of women. With regard to violence and harassment, the ILO must concentrate on measures in the workplace and the discussion on domestic violence, which is very important, requires separate treatment. The major challenge for Austria is finding a way to a qualitative and quantitatively growing care economy. Even if we are discussing a model of universal care, we have to ensure that we produce well-paid and worthwhile work conditions. It is a long and hard road, but we must not give up the struggle to achieve equal rights and equal treatment for women. Thank you.

Employer (Argentina)

I would like to start by welcoming, on behalf of Argentinean industry, the Director-General of the ILO and the President of the 107th Conference. This dialogue is a celebration of a debate which allows us to make firm progress on the agenda as it affects the world of work and the problems which we are facing. We all share a willingness to overcome the challenges currently facing the society of which we are all part. There are disruptive changes sometimes in the framework of new techno-productive and socio-economic formats. In that context, social dialogue is the key tool we can use to face these changes and work to resolve structural problems such as unemployment, the informal economy, improvements in productivity and the growth rate. Without dialogue we will be overwhelmed by the weight of the challenges we face. Moreover, this year we have the recurrent discussion on social dialogue in the framework of which the conference has drawn up an agenda of great relevance, which is the question of gender in the world of work and the progress which has been made by the constituents in developing instruments to promote equality. Achieving gender equality is a priority matter for the employers' sector. We are committed to a large number and great variety of initiatives to promote equal opportunity in the workplace. Improvements we have made in that regard show, for example, that there has been a reduction in the pay gap and a growth in involvement of women in the labour market. There is still a long way to go to ensure that we all proceed on an equal footing. This debate will have to consider the competitiveness of each country, and possible ways of developing SMEs. In the Argentine Industry Union we particularly promote tripartite dialogue. We believe that it is currently crucial to define a modern body of legislation in line with technological changes and the need to generate new forms of jobs and to deal with the formal sector. We are adapting to new forms of production and we are also moving with the changes which are taking place in productivity. Going along with the digital economy and the Fourth Industrial Revolution is not merely an option; it is the only way of facing the challenges in the future world of work. This necessarily means creating more companies and new productive activities. This agenda means that Argentina has a great opportunity. Our country has the honour and responsibility of hosting this year the G20, and the Argentine Industrial Union is at the forefront of the work of Business 20 with Daniel Funes de Rioja in the chair of this business forum, and we will be promoting the vision of the ILO at global level in that regard. We are working on matters which are very closely linked to the ILO agenda, technological change and innovation. Moreover, we continue to make progress on debating modern labour legislation in line with the emergent realities of the modern world of work, creating jobs and companies with an equal and reasonable tax burden, particularly for SMEs and regional economies. All of these objectives require that we combine three strategic objectives, which are education, innovation and the continuous improvement of productivity. The path to development means that we must redouble our efforts and pool our willpower. Industry in Argentina is facing this challenge. The future is shared capital which requires an input from everyone. Thank you.

Government (Bahrain)

In the name of God, most Merciful, most Compassionate, Your Excellency, the President of the Conference, ladies and gentlemen, it is my pleasure to convey to you the greetings of the people and the leadership of the Kingdom of Bahrain. I wish you all success in this ILC. It is also my pleasure to congratulate Your Excellency for your election as President of this conference. I congratulate you for this trust that has been placed upon you. I would also like to thank His Excellency the Director-General for the great efforts that he has made. I would like to thank him for having chosen to focus on the Women at Work initiative in his report, because we believe that equality and equal opportunities is very important in the world of work. This is a key issue that all countries in the world focus on, despite the fact that Mr Guy Ryder has said that we are still a long way from achieving the goal of equality. So despite this fact, I personally am optimistic because I have noted that most countries in the world are working in order to enhance the participation of women in the world of work, and this is something that we clearly see because these governments and countries have ratified, including my country, Bahrain, they have all ratified a number of international conventions and treaties that have to do with women, and mainly the convention on the elimination of discrimination against women. All these governments are working hard in order to fulfil their obligations under these conventions and treaties. The Kingdom of Bahrain has made great progress in terms of enhancing equal opportunities and in terms of increasing women's participation in labour markets. All these efforts are supported by His Majesty King Hamad bin Isa al Khalifa, the King of the Kingdom of Bahrain. His Majesty the King, back in 2001, established the Supreme Council for Women, which is a council that is presided over by Her Royal Highness the Princess consort of Bahrain, Princess Sabeeka al Khalifa, and this Supreme Council for Women supervises the implementation of all national plans aimed at promoting women in Bahrain, in all fields, and ensuring that they realize their full potential. Women in the Kingdom of Bahrain constitute 39 per cent of the working force. They also constitute more than 50 per cent of the working force in the public sector, and in some sectors, mainly the sectors of education and health services, women represent 80 per cent of the workforce. And according to national statistics and reports, we have noted an increase in the average income of women in the Kingdom of Bahrain over the past decade. This increase was by 100 per cent. It is thanks to a number of rehabilitation and training programs that we have implemented that we have managed to achieve this progress. These programs have also led to an increase in the integration of women in the labour market and to their integration and work in new fields without any discrimination in terms of wages, treatment or privileges. Women in the Kingdom of Bahrain also receive a number of incentives in order to facilitate and enhance their participation in the working market, and women now own 39 per cent of businesses registered in the commercial registry of Bahrain. Of course, in the Kingdom of Bahrain we will continue to make every effort in order to ensure that women obtain the social protection and the respect that they deserve, and here I call upon this organization to enhance programs aimed at promoting social partners and in order for all stakeholders to be fully aware of the opportunities available in order to increase the integration of women. And I would like also to refer to the Director-General's report regarding the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, in which the Director-General stated that there has been a clear deterioration in the conditions in labour markets, including a decrease in employment levels and a lack of job security and equality because of the stoppage of the peace process and because of the settlements that are built by Israel. And here I would like to say that the Kingdom of Bahrain stands with the Palestinian people so that they can achieve their rights. Thank you for your attention.

Worker (Norway)

Honoured delegates, ladies and gentlemen, for the world to progress people need to work. To enhance welfare for individuals, people need decent work and a living wage. I think we all agree about that, but yet I dare to say there are still those who are not so clear about it when it comes to women. Suddenly comes the argument that women should be able to work if they want to. No one says that about a man. Women are still seen by many as second-class workers, and in effect they actually are. Women are paid less even in well-paid jobs. Women are overrepresented in the informal economic. Women are overrepresented in part-time jobs but underrepresented in power and leadership. Therefore, I highly welcome the report from the Director-General. We really do need to push for equality between women and men. In the process, the Agenda 2030 and the Sustainable Development Goals are essential. To achieve Goal 8, sustained inclusive and sustainable economic growth, we need work for all, including all women. Equal pay for work and of equal value must become a reality once and for all, and we need decent work where all workers feel safe and secure. This of course brings me to the crucial issue of violence and harassment. Fighting violence against women has been at the core of the women's movement since its beginning, yet the #MeToo campaign has ushered an unpredicted impact. Women across the world have finally realized enough is enough. In this situation we have at the table a proposal. We cannot afford to miss the opportunity now to tackle the massive issue of violence and harassment in the world of work. We need a strong Convention backed up by a Recommendation. This is important in itself, but it is also a crucial step on the way to enable women's full and equality participation in working life. This in turn will give them the ability to support themselves and become economically independent. Representing the trade unions of Norway here today, I also feel an urgency to make a note on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. In the appendix to the Director-General's report on this matter we can read how Israel's occupation is contributing to the highest unemployment rate in the world. Worst affected are women. In Gaza, the unemployment rate among women has reached nearly 69 per cent. Recent research also indicates that the prolonged blockade and absence of economic opportunities is a central driver of gender-based violence in Gaza. Renewed efforts must now be taken to put an end to over 50 years of occupation. Honoured assembly, gender equality is at the heart of this conference. Women's rights are human rights. There is no reason why women should be left behind anymore, and there is no better time for the ILO to take new steps than now. Thank you.

Government (Iceland)

Mr President, Vice-President, ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of the Government of Iceland, it gives me a special pleasure to address this 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. First, let me thank the Director-General and his staff for the outstanding preparatory work they have done in order to facilitate the work of the conference. Ending violence and harassment in the world of work is one of the main tasks of this year's conference. As we have learned last winter through social media, in relation to the #MeToo movement, sexual assault and harassment is widespread through our societies, especially in the workplaces. Violence against women and girls is rooted in gender-based discrimination, social norms and gender stereotypes. Given the devastating effect violence has on women, efforts have mainly focussed on responses and services for survivors. However, the best way to end violence against women and girls is to prevent it from happening in the first place by addressing the root and the structural causes. Prevention should start early in life by educating and working with young boys and girls, promoting respectful relationships and gender equality. Despite year-long international programmes aiming to end child labour and modern slavery, we are still facing that millions of children across the world are engaged in child labour. We are also watching men and women and children being victims of modern slavery each day. One thing is for sure, we may not give up in our battle ending the violence against human beings. It has to come to an end. We need to continue our good work in doing so, for example with the projects taking place within the ILO. The Nordic labour market is well organized, with strong organizations of employees and employers whom negotiate terms and conditions in collective agreements. I welcome the tripartite dialogue between the governments and the social partners taking place here at this conference on this important issue. Together we all have to send a clear message to the world of work of zero tolerance of violence. We are also concerned about gender equality at workplaces. After years of struggling that women and men should have equal pay for equal work, the Icelandic Government and the social partners together made the special equal pay standard. According to a new Icelandic Act entering into force in January 2018, the companies and institutions employing 25 or more employees on an annual basis will be required to obtain equal pay certification of their equal pay system. The Act will be fully implemented by the end of 2021. We are hopeful that this new system will eliminate the gender pay gap on the Icelandic labour market and can be used as best practices in this field. I would also like to inform you that it is now under consideration that the other Nordic countries will use the standard as a tool to eliminate the gender pay gap in their countries. The future of work is one of the most popular topics these days. There are many questions coming up in this respect as what will be the impact of artificial intelligence and automation on work. We are also seeing changing models for work and work structure, including increasing use of temporary contracts, along with a growing prevalence of freelance workers. The Nordic government's close cooperation with Nordic social partners started in 2017 a multiannual project that focuses on the future challenge in the labour market, with the aim of analysing how the Nordic working life might look like in 2030. Researchers from the five Nordic countries, under the leadership of the Norwegian Institute for Labour and Social Research, will study how the ongoing transformations of production at labour markets will influence the future of work in the Nordic countries. As part of the project, there have been several conferences, one in Helsinki, another in Oslo, and now in May in Stockholm. The final Future of Work conference will be held in Reykjavik in April 2019 with the title Shaping the future that works for all. The results will be communicated in presentations made by researchers prior to the ILO anniversary 2019. Intermediary results from the project will feed into Nordic debates on how to contribute to the Future of Work Agenda that is to be adopted at the ILO centenary anniversary 2019. It is our hope that this project will produce input in our deliberations on future direction for the International Labour Organization for the years to come. Thank you for your attention.

Government (Cameroon)

President, ladies and gentlemen, first of all I would like most sincerely to congratulate on behalf of my country, Cameroon, the President of the Conference as well as the members of the Bureau for the brilliant election and the way that which the work is being led on the very eve of the ILO's centenary dedicated to the initiative of Women at Work. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General, Mr Guy Ryder, for his extremely comprehensive report on the achievements of our organization, and we would like to assure him of the full support of the delegation of Cameroon for all possible improvements in future. Women in Cameroon are indeed the victims of gender-based discrimination, which does not enable them to develop fully. However, in my country a legal framework of protection relating to their rights has been set up, and this also covers the ratification of the eight core Conventions of the ILO, as well as those dealing with maternity. The results of the implementation of these standards are tangible: equal access to work, a free choice in their professions, elimination of discrimination when taken on at work, equality of remuneration, the right of association, maternity protection, and the adoption of a national gender policy, and a creation of a ministry on promoting women and families. This ministerial department in particular follows that the equity policy based on gender is reflected in the budget of all the ministries. In practice, a woman heads the TUC in Cameroon, 11 women are members of the Government and over 30 per cent of women are represented in Parliament in the National Assembly and the Senate, and they occupy already high-level posts in the prefectures. In the executive authorities of my country, we see that there are many women mayors and deputy women mayors in each commune in Cameroon. The Government also includes representative of women's associations within the Committee on Social Dialogue, and they can express themselves freely to put forward the point of view of women workers. There's also perfect equality when it comes to the governmental delegation that I head at present during these sessions. However, in spite of the significant progress propelled by political will, which was clearly expressed by President Paul Biya, a great deal remains to be done. In particular the creation of quality jobs, the promotion of women's associations, improvement of a legal framework, protection of maternity, and support in the struggle to counter violence against women in all its forms. In order to achieve this, the ILO and its constituents have to do more to ensure that women remain in charge of their time so that their work is recognized properly, and in order to strengthen means of expression and representation of women, at the same time putting an end to violence and harassment. We think that any form of violence needs to be severely repressed and sanctioned. Ladies and gentlemen, the implementation of the Decent Work Country Programme is being continued in my country, and the Government is very much involved in it. When it comes to social partners, we are setting up appropriate legislation which is better adapted when it comes to the representation of trade unions in Cameroon. I have no doubt, ladies and gentlemen, that the various interventions and contributions in our discussions will enable us to improve ILO's action and thereby also to improve the daily lives of our population. Thank you very much for your attention.

Worker (Sweden)

Yes, Esteemed President, on behalf of the Swedish workers, I would like to emphasize the following. Next year the ILO will celebrate 100 years of struggle for peace and decent work. The challenges that lie ahead for the next 100 years and the future of work comes in many forms: populism, hostile political agendas, precarious employment, extremely fragmented production. The technology may be new, but the struggle and challenges for decent work and fundamental rights are the same. The fundamental objective of the ILO since the establishment of the organization has been to strive for peace and to fight all kind of unrest. The road to success goes via decent work, equity, democracy, gender equality, freedom and security. For that reason, a strong and forceful ILO is more relevant and critical in 2018 than it has been for a very long time. The Director-General's report emphasized the key role the ILO must play in taking on the fight against unfair world of work for women. The ILO must be in the forefront to make a strong push for equality. The global #MeToo movement bore witness to the millions of women who are victims of harassment and violence in their daily lives. This discrimination is apparent everywhere, but it clearly shows that most of the harassments occurs in women's workplaces. It is time to stop talking. Now we need action, and that's why we workers of Sweden urge governments and employers to meet our demand for new Convention together with a Recommendation against harassment and violence against women and men in the world of work. Social dialogue is a cornerstone of the ILO. We welcome the recurrent discussion on social dialogue. Respect for the constituents is a precondition for creating a world of work based on decent work. The ILO recently demonstrated that countries like Sweden, with strong social partners and respect for workers' rights, including the right to strike, are better prepared and are more resilient in the event of financial and social unrest, and research clearly state that they score the highest when it comes to productivity and equality. Two years ago in the UN General Assembly, the Swedish Prime Minister launched a concept of Global Deal. With more than 90 affiliated unions, businesses and governments, the goal of the imitative is within reach. For states, the Global Deal means ratifying and respecting the ILO's core Conventions, including the right to organize, the right to negotiate, and the right to strike, as well as recognising social dialogue as an essential part of the democratic form of government. For employers and companies, this means respecting these rights in practice, taking their social responsibility and being prepared to negotiate agreements locally, regionally and globally. And for trade unions it means cooperating and taking social responsibility when they negotiate, but also contributing to the overall development of companies. The Swedish workers, together with the ITC would like to encourage the ILO and employers to not only contribute but also step up their efforts to endorse the Global Deal in the ongoing discussion here at the conference, in link to a discussion of development and Agenda 2030. And President, on behalf of LO and TCO, I want to express our profound solidarity with the working men and women of Palestine. The Director-General's report about workers of the occupied Arab territory demonstrates that the decent work deficit in Palestine is alarming. We share the hopelessness and the urge for immediate change to address the reality of the ongoing development. We, together with the global trade union movement, strongly condemn the extreme violence conducted by Israel last week. The violence and the killings must have a stop immediately. The ILO was formed to preserve the development of peace. The action taken by the government of Israel is in direct conflict with that goal. The occupation must end, the trade blockade must be terminated and the daily harassment of civilians must be stopped. The workers of Palestine can no longer be denied the right to decent work and a better future. We welcome the Swedish Government's recognition of Palestine as a state, and we believe that it will support the progressive forces, both in Palestine and Israel, to act towards achieving a two-state solution. We want to reaffirm our support to finding a lasting solution that will lead to Israel and Palestine living side by side in peace and security, but today all we can see is an unfair occupation leading in the opposite direction ... [vgr INTERRUPTION 5:13]

Employer (Kenya)

Mr President, Vice-Presidents, I welcome the Director-General's informative report. We consider it important to assess progress on the implementation of the four ILO strategic objectives, namely employment, social protection, social dialogue, and tripartism and fundamental principles and rights at work. Employment creation remains a key factor for Africa's development. The ILO should support both the development of employment policies and strategies and commit resources for their implementation. Although ILO has aggressively pushed for the improvement of the welfare of workers in Africa, it has lagged behind in advocating for a conducive environment for business and conditions that will support the creation of quality jobs and the transition of informal jobs into decent ones. Initiatives to support enterprise development and sustainability should be a key component of the ILO Decent Work Agenda, hence employers require ILO to provide enhanced support in promoting enterprise growth and creation of decent jobs. On social protection, I agree with the report that, despite the commendable strides made to enhance the coverage and benefit, a lot still needs to be done. There are no quick fixes or a one-size-fits-all solution to the social protection challenge. However, ILO can help the tripartite constituents to put in place social protection frameworks based on best practices. ILO constituents need to work collaboratively to find practical solutions to enhance the social protection coverage and benefits. However, this should be done without increasing the cost of doing business and pushing heavy regulatory burdens on employers as proposed by some governments in the developing world. Social dialogue and tripartism are important for proper functioning of the labour sector. There should be a close correlation between the state of social dialogue and tripartism and the state of industrial peace and harmony. Strengthening both formal and informal social dialogue structures and tripartite institutions should be a priority of stakeholders in the labour sector. In this regard, the role of social partners and their right to represent and speak for their members should be recognized and respected. Efforts by some governments to oust social partners from tripartite labour sector institutions, such as social security boards where they play a key role in driving changes to improve the conditions of work, is ill-advised and counterproductive. The support of the ILO is needed to create awareness and protect freedom of association of both employers' and workers' organizations. President, the Director-General's report indicates that few women have made it to the top of the corporate ladder. In addition, women continue to occupy low paying jobs and are more likely to suffer violence and harassment at work. We agree that to achieve gender equality in the changing world of work there is need to bridge the gap between women's aspirations and the labour market reality. It is interesting to note that the majority of both women and men across the globe want women to work in paid-for jobs. This calls for us to equip women with the right skills and competencies that will enable them to access better jobs. A number of employer federations in Africa are implementing programs such as the Female Future Programme aimed at building the capacity of women to take on higher-level roles in the corporate world and other spheres of society. Under initiatives being done by employers globally include fair recruitment, compensation and promotion policies, flexible working arrangements and workplace support structures for young mothers. The ILO should support these initiatives and programmes in the developing economies to enhance the employability of women and reduce inequalities in this area. Employers believe that this is a shared responsibility and that the governments have a role to play. A strict legal approach which increases regulatory burdens and shifts responsibility to enterprises should be avoided. Governments and public authorities need to design incentives and policy mix that support employers' efforts. The initiatives by employers are likely to fall short unless governments also play an effective role in breaking down structural, social, cultural and legal barriers in providing access to meaningful employment to women. I thank you, Mr President.

Government (Benin)

President of the Conference, President of the Governing Body, Director-General of the ILO, Ministers, Heads of delegations, ladies and gentlemen. The Report of the Director-General of the ILO which speaks about the initiative of Women at Work, a push for equality, reminds member States very appropriately on the need to take initiatives in order to limit constraints placed on women in work throughout the world. This report states directly that women are subjected to major constraints in the workplace. Among those, we could mention the long hours that they work and inequality of treatment in their professions, the matter of the low representation of women when it comes to distribution of quotas for shares of responsibility and the power that relates in the workplace, sexual harassment that they are subjected to in their enterprises, in public services, etc. President, the delegation of Benin feels that the constraints that women labour under are very real. The initiatives taken by States and international institutions when it comes to policies and strategies in the field of employment, vocational training, representation and participation of women in legislative, communal, presidential elections. My country, Benin, is the land of Amazons, ex-Dahomey, who have demonstrated their bravery from the seventeenth to the nineteenth century, and Benin is well aware that when women are given the opportunities and the means they can deploy their full potential and are able to carry out great feats of courage. And so the Government of Benin, together with the support of their technical and financial partners, have set up programmes to promote women and their autonomy. And so in the period 2016-2021, in a programme of action, Benin revealed there is a programme to promote the economical autonomy of women and the gender parity and allocated appropriate resources as well as a follow-up strategy for the benefit of thousands of women. There are also other programmes that are set up with many different objectives and operational fields in many different domains. President, when it comes to the problem of harassment of women in the workplace, Benin adopted a law on the 5 September 2006, which aims to sanction the perpetrators of sexual harassment and to protect victims. President, the situation of women based on decent work, and that's one of the Recommendations that is included in the Report of the Director-General, this can contribute significantly to the momentum of gender equality. To ensure that women are better able to manage their times is a very pertinent and laudable measure. It has to take into account the many different situations of women in the workplace and the level of development in each country. President, as we see it, recognizing the work carried out by women properly means that any intervention taken to promote this remains to be welcome. It is imperative that other standard setting measures are taken in order to tackle the various influences that bear weight on them. President, the social and economic problems, together with the problems of youth employment, graduate unemployment, the informal economy and the development of it, the worst forms of child labour, social protection, social dialogue, collective bargaining, all this must not be affected as the result of insufficient funds allocated to them by the international community. President, we very much welcome the achievements of our organization, the ILO. It is recommended, when it comes to the change of paradigm in the ILO for the coming centenary, that it takes into account contemporary realities in the field of work. We would like to thank the Director-General and his assistants for the technical and financial assistance given to us as member States including my country, the Republic of Benin. Long live the International Labour Organization. Long live social peace throughout the world. Long live Benin. Thank you very much,

Mr Choubey

Employer (India)

Mr President and distinguished persons who are always behind me, delegates, advisers, my friends from a strong team of India, ladies and gentlemen. It is an immense pleasure for me to speak before you in this plenary session. I have got a special gift for all of you that is a good message from 1.25 billion people of India, the land of Mahatma Gandhi. We compliment the Director-General for his powerful opening remark and the report of The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality, which had really prescribed the [vgr INAUDIBLE 1:23] of our social dialogue and tripartism. India is on a fast moving trajectory of economic development. The present GDP is $2.5 trillion, which is expected to grow to $6 trillion by 2030. Only the last quarter saw 7.7 per cent growth rate, which is the fastest economy in the world today. The initiative and the agenda for the Government of the people of India are in line with the ILO, and that is decent world of work, green initiative, security, safety and health for the working staff, migration of labour, environment protection, healthy climate, gender related equality, skill development and development of micro and medium industries. Sir, the emerging global market of economy are bound to lift the global economy as such. Sir, the employment growth has been the full agenda of ILO, and so of India. You will be surprised to know that global unemployment crossed 200 million in 2017 and is expected to grow to 212 million by 2019. Sixty-one million employment has been lost by the year 2008, which was economic meltdown. ILO report shows that though global unemployment had been stabilizing, still there is a big gap between unemployment and deficit of clean work, decent work, all over the world presently. Sir, India's Decent Work Country Programme 2018-22 has focused better on quality jobs and social protection, transitional to formal employment and other. Indian employers are committed to meet this objective. Sir, green jobs in different sectors require different skill sets to create employment of workers. India can do much better and so development countries much better if the policy of protectionism is reviewed. There is a need for migration of labour from one country to other, particularly from developing country to developed country. You allow labour force to move like a migratory bird, and I can assure, give them place to stand, they will turn your economy. Sir, a skill development and a skill and knowledge are the drivers of economy in all lessons. India National Policy of Skill Development and Entrepreneurship 2015 targets 400 million by 2022. Vocational training has been introduced in more than 2,400 schools, improving about of 2.5 lakh students all over India now. Promotion of small and micro industry is on priority, and the employers are committed to it. Gender equality has been the core issue of integral part of human rights. There is a need to be more cautious on sexual harassment. It affects the world of work, the productivity as such. India has passed legislation and has declared it a criminal offence. Sir, India is together with ILO in combating all this menace which we are facing, and we ensure you that we are embedded to development. Thank you very much for listening. We wish the centenary celebrations all success. Thank you. Long live ILO. Long live India.

Worker (Myanmar)

Thank you Chair. In referring to the 332nd Session on the GB and included in number nine of the report of the Governing Body up to March 2018, CTUM is very proud to say that as a country we will not have to submit reports of forced labour to the Governing Body. It took the trade unions and ILO nearly 30 years to stop forced labour in the country, and for that we needed international expertise, logistics which was combined with the political will of the people. We admit that there still exists some forced labour, but we getting closer to eradication. In 2011, the Labour Organization Law drawn up with the help of the ILO Labour Law and Reform Unit was passed. The Labour Organization Rules was passed in 2012 and as FTUB we returned back in 2012. In 2015, only after four years of passing the Labour Organization Law, with the help of the ILO, the National Tripartite Dialogue Forum was established. The Technical Working Group for the Labour Law Reforms, Social Protection Law, the Decent Country Work Programme, migrations, were established gradually from the social dialogue forum. Myanmar has been working as a tripartite approach. The second cycle of the national minimum wage was established through a tripartite process. The process mentioned above fulfils the ILO standards for a Decent Work Country Programme, a fact that the Minister of Labour, the employers represented by the UMFCCI and the workers represented by us, took a lot of time and effort to establish in a five-years period, a very short time frame, and all in sync with the political changes within the country. Through the tripartite process the needed amendment within the Labour Law reform were developed. Even though we are in a democratic movement environment, if legislators keep their eyes closed to change, keep saying we have to work according to the Myanmar way, which did not work for the last 30 years, we will always be in a conflict with the international norms, the changing work styles, and then due to our own actions international investment will not be coming in. The judiciary will not consider the changing styles of work, even though the business is a multinational enterprise, the workers are taxpayers. Myanmar workers on that offshore platform launched an appeal at the Supreme Court on the basis that when the 1951 Factory Act was drawn this type of work was not in place and the effort that this law doesn't include these workers. These are Myanmar citizens paying tax. The Thai offshore company celebrated its silver jubilee and has been giving tax. Both legal entities, and yet for production of Myanmar workers who are Myanmar citizens, the judgment refers to a law drawn up while these types of work are not around, and our workers are not protected by this law. This avoidance of responsibility by the authorities is what undermines the industrial peace. When the law not is specific, within the dispute settlement mechanism, the Arbitration Council is the highest body. Yet, when the Arbitration Council decides for the reinstatement of a dismissed worker, the employer has a loophole to pay a penalty of $1,000 and avoid reinstatement. This undermines the trust of the workers in the arbitration system. Freedom of association, the foundation for the Decent Work Country Programme, social dialogue or even better industrial relations, is still badly being understood but all stakeholders as well as by the legislators. Myanmar workers again requested ILO to open an FoA office and raise the social dialogue awareness thoroughly with all stakeholders. The need for an FoA office in Myanmar was expressed by the Myanmar Minister and the Worker's delegate both in their speeches at the 106th Conference. The right to peaceful assembly and peaceful procession law and its amendments, combined with the Labour Organization Law, Article 50, denied the workers and the trade unions any place to assemble and make public their grievances. Just a few days ago, the Education Ministry denied any kind of political lectures, seminars or talks at universities and colleges. Denying peaceful assembly, denying university students the right to political discussions indicates a single party trend. These together with the weakness in the laws and enforcements undermined the investment community, making them wonder whether the country's dark days have returned. At this 107th ILC, discussions are centred on the new platform type of work, gig economy, and the fourth industrial changes. These types of worker entering Myanmar, for example, Uber, Grab and online marketing, while we still do not have the new laws in place, or old laws amended by tripartite structures, for on-demand economy. Recently, we had over 100 Grab drivers protesting against a company and no jurisdiction under the labour law. The Myanmar workers also request that the memorandum for the Decent Work Country Programme, which was endorsed by the National Tripartite Dialogue Forum, is not signed at this 107th ILC. We request ILO to have a dedicated awareness-raising programme in Myanmar for the human resources of labour disputes settlement mechanism. This could be done if the ILO supports an industrial relations institute in Myanmar that will help develop the social dialogue awareness. We are a country in a democratic transition, and to develop a strong social dialogue mechanism, just like during the forced labour era, Myanmar needs expertise from the ILO so that all social dialogue partners and the legislators understand the issues, topics, approaches at the same level. Thank you very much.

Worker (Bahrain)

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. At the outset, I should like to extend my congratulations to the President for having elected him, and you are up to the job, sir. Mr President, distinguished delegates of the conference, at the outset I have to applaud this organization, which represents the labour parliament of the world as it approaches its first centenary next year, 2019. As Mr Guy Ryder, the Director-General, has said, we will be making history as we will be celebrating the 100th anniversary of this time-honoured organization, which has always been a forum for social dialogue between the production partners. It has made many achievements and is facing many challenges, which it has to confront with the greatest spirit of tripartism, since that spirit is the most precious value this organization possesses. Under item five of its agenda, our conference is discussing the adoption of an instrument to end harassment and violence in the world of work. Our federation strongly supports the adoption of a binding instrument, namely a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation to ensure protecting men and women from being subjected to any form of harassment and violence and being protected from any hostile work environment conducive to such conduct. At the domestic level, we would like to remind the distinguished members of the conference that the tripartite agreement between the three partners in Bahrain has completed its fourth year in its supplementary version, signed on 10 March 2014, between the three production partners under the auspices of the ILO. That agreement was a template for cooperation between the production partners. However, unfortunately today we are witnessing the disruption of the implementation of such an agreement, the disruption of the meetings of the tripartite committee responsible for its limitation, which means that the dismissed workers will be exposed to poverty and want, them and their families, without any hope for an end to their suffering. We call upon the organization to play the role it has been enshrined in the agreement through the committee of experts, since the governing body of the organization in its 320th Session of March 2014, adopted a resolution stressing the role of the organization in providing a comprehensive full and effective supervisory role of that agreement, so as to ensure the reinstatement and redress of those workers, who have been dismissed for more than seven years, as well as to ensure the implementation of the other items of the agreement, compensation of social securities and back pays and not dismissing them again on the same grounds. It is important to indicate the memorandum of understanding between the three partners on the implementation of the Decent Work Country Programme in Bahrain has not been implemented, although it has been signed in 2010 it deprived the three partners of developing their potential and skills in achieving their goals of decent work based of social justice and human dignity. While we see the organization advancing today, its vision for the future of work, we are at a standstill calling for the implementation of the pioneering programme in Bahrain of decent work. Our General Federation is calling upon the organization to play a greater role for the implement of this MoU, since signing a memorandum is not a goal in itself if not coupled with implementation. In conclusion, Mr President, I would like to note the Report of the Director-General on his visit to the occupied Arab territories. He has lifted the veil on a grave tragedy experienced by the workers here, conditions of violence, exclusion, unemployment which made records, which makes it incumbent upon the organization of this conference to work seriously and urgently to find the solution to this grave tragedy. In his statement before the Workers' group, the Director-General has said we have to move from words to deeds. I would be remiss here if I did not mention that the workers in Bahrain reject the decision-making Al-Quds, Jerusalem, the capital of Israel. The Palestinian people have the right to a state that carries its name, that expresses its identity with the holy Al-Quds as its capital. May God's blessing and mercy be upon you. Thank you.

Government (Mongolia)

Mr President, delegates, ladies and gentlemen, it's a great honour for me to have an opportunity to make a statement on behalf of the Government of Mongolia at the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. This year marks the fifth anniversary since Mongolia became member of the International Labour Organization. Over the last five decades Mongolia has ratified 20 Conventions including the eight fundamental Conventions addressing core aspects of labour relations. Mongolia highly values its cooperation with ILO and appreciates its support in developing social dialogue in Mongolia, strengthening tripartite consensus mechanism, the reform of labour laws, social insurance systems as well as reducing unemployment. In 2016, the Parliament of Mongolia voted Mongolia's Sustainable Development Vision 2030, which set out national goals in attaining Sustainable Development Goals, such as ending poverty, gender equality, decent work and inclusive growth, and reduced inequality among others. With the view of achieving Sustainable Social Development Goals, by increasing decent work set out in Mongolia's Sustainable Development Vision 2030, the Government of Mongolia has recently adopted a state policy on employment. The Government of Mongolia strongly supports Future of Work initiative, initiated under the leadership of the Director-General. Today's world of work is facing many challenges, including technological changes, climate change, income and gender disparities, reduce labour force participation, changing in demographic structures. In this regard, the Government of Mongolia is undertaking actions aimed at increasing public awareness of decent employment, introducing market-research-based employment policy formulation coherent with development policies, promoting decent work in remote and low economic development regions, and ensuring equal participation of people with disabilities and women in the labour market. In this context, the Memorandum of Understanding of implementation of the second Decent Work Country Programme was signed 6 December 2017, between Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of Mongolia, Confederation of Mongolian Trade Union, Mongolia Employers' Federation and the International Labour Organization. The aim of this Memorandum of Understanding is to create decent employment opportunities, effective implementation of the ILO Conventions. Considering the private importance of gender equality and the empowerment women and girls and the implementation of global goals, as well as to ensuring the implementation of the Law on Gender Equality that was adopted by Parliament in 2011. The government of Mongolia recently approved the National Programme on Gender Equality that addresses issues such as labour exploitation, discrimination and sexual harassment in the workplace, and equal pay for work of equal value, and green jobs. Within this context, the current draft of labour law that is being discussed at the Parliament of Mongolia also includes specific provisions dealing with the basic principles such as freedom of association, non-discrimination, as well as abolition of child labour, the elimination of forced or compulsory labour, and harassment. Also under the current reform of labour law, the preparatory works are underway for ratification of the Labour Inspection Convention 81 and 129. Taking this opportunity, I would like to express Mongolian support of the ILO's work on international standards on the prohibition of the violence and harassment at work in the form of Recommendation. I wish very success for conference to all. Thank you very much for your kind attention.

Government (Liberia)

Mr Director-General, fellow delegates, I bring you greetings and felicitations on behalf of His Excellency President George Manneh Weah, the Government and people of the Republic of Liberia for the invitation extended to us on the occasion of the 107th Session of the ILO. Moreover, we are grateful to you Mr Director-General and your able lieutenants and are deeply moved by the very cordial and stimulating welcome you have extended to us. The history of Liberia as a country that was plagued by a 14-year civil crisis is universal knowledge. Therefore, as a people, we are cognizant and remain resolute in looking towards a better future by consolidating the gains and dividends of peace, which characterize a post-conflict and fragile state.

In this regard, Liberia has embarked upon a programme of recovery subsequent to the inauguration of the newly elected Government in January 2018. As part of our progress of this recovery, we have endeavoured to ensure the maximum implementation of Liberia's Decent Work Act of 2015, as well as forging to meet international best labour practices, standards and procedures. We also realize that we live in an era largely dependent on business and industry, the success of which contributes to the peace, progress and prosperity of our individual nations. Because of this realization, upon our ascendancy as Minister of Labour, we undertook a series of initiatives to surmount the numerous challenges confronting the labour sector in Liberia. Some of our cardinal initiatives include: giving workers a measure of social protection ensuring their participation in institutions and processes of social dialogue, establishing a regulatory environment which facilitates and promotes the attainment of decent work in Liberia, gave credence to obligations incurred by Liberia as a member State of the International Labour Organization, the ILO, reducing obstacles to efficient competition by business through the promotion of economic development and growth that can be shared throughout Liberia. To ensure the successful implementation of our initiative mentioned supra, it will be a matter of exigency during my incumbency to strengthen the National Tripartite Committee, the body that advises the Minister on employment and labour market issues. The Government, employers and workers are the components of the National Tripartite Committee, the NTC. It is also our intention to convene a National Labour Conference to review the labour code and the institution of a reform agenda for all labour organizations and trade unions in Liberia. We also intend to create a post-conflict context, a culture of social dialogue, foster peace and to contribute to social stability through the promotion of good governance within the labour sector. To achieve this, Government, workers and employers must work harmoniously, recognize that successful social dialogue is a potential to resolve critical economic and social issues, advance social and industrial peace and stability, and promote economy progress. It is our belief that a promotion of consensus building and democratic involvement of all stakeholders within the labour sector will ultimately assist in maintaining the agenda of the ILO worldwide. In conclusion, let me emphatically state that we are forging ahead with the struggle to give our people a greater measure of freedom, prosperity and happiness. Therefore, we wish to assure this assembly that going forward we portray two intentions. Firstly, we will continue to engage players within the labour sector to enable us to collectively resolve the problems besetting the labour sector in Liberia. Secondly, to fully comply with and implement the conventions, treaties and protocols of the ILO at optimum. We are gratified by your invitation, and we grateful to be here. I thank you.

Government (Syrian Arab Republic)

Mr President, Excellencies, Ministers and Heads of delegations, ladies and gentlemen, the Syrian Arab Republic was keen to participate constructively and effectively in the sessions of this conference and for constructively dealing with the issues that are set on its agenda and has always committed to the constitution of the ILO and its conventions out of its belief in the tireless efforts to achieve development, human dignity and justice for all of humanity. My country has faced many challenges. Over the past seven years there was a ferocious and unjust war of terror raging against my country, funded by foreign countries that foster terrorism, who mobilized in the war the most dangerous terror groups, and they have also implemented unilateral course of measures against the Syrian people in complete disregard to international legality. They directed their tools of terrorist organizations to implement systematic plans to undermine the production and services infrastructure, which were built by the same people over the decades. We are steadfast in regaining our stability and safety and providing decent living conditions for our citizens, which would enable their safe and expedited return to their jobs. We have started the economic reconstruction process and development. We launched a development project for Syria in the post-war period in a comprehensive framework, and we have dedicated a large part of it to enhancing the social living systems, including Decent Work Programmes and reactivating jobs and opportunities as part of this project. We are still speaking here, Mr President, while the occupied Golan is still living under occupation, and workers in the occupied Golan are still suffering from discriminatory policies against them, depriving them of them launching enterprises and economic projects in their lands. It is denying them decent work opportunities as a basic human right. The dedication of the title in the Report of the Director-General with regard to the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, under the title further integration of the occupied Syrian Golan, was not a lucky choice. It would have been worthwhile to mention clearly that there were arbitrary measures taken by the Israeli occupation entities and to the suffering of the Syrian workers in the occupied Golan. We would have liked to see also a mention of the practices of the Israeli authorities in Palestine, which are going against international conventions and legality and all related resolutions, and calling for Israel to stop its occupation and its crimes rather than mentioning the further integration of the occupied Golan. Mr President, we are revising our Decent Work standards and promoting them in our work and reinforcing the precepts of the Syrian Constitution, which guarantees equality and opportunities between the citizens in harmony with our commitments to the ILO Conventions, and we have the National Tripartite Dialogue and Consultation Committee, which has consecrated tripartite social dialogue in practice and in legislation. We are working on further employment for women and guaranteeing the necessary safety elements, and also we have developed many practices in the labour market in order to achieve labour market [vgr INAUDIBLE 4:21] system, and we have implemented a number of targeted bundles to reorganize the labour market, which focused on answering the needs for the recovery of the industrial sector through training and also through fostering small and micro enterprises and enabling persons with disability to integrate to the job market. We in Syria view positively the initiative launched by the ILO, especially the Future of Work initiative, which can help draw the outlines of a fairer world that takes a greater care of human rights in the world of work. Also, the Women at Work initiative: The push for equality, which is on this session's agenda, we support the DG's report in this regard in calling for further equality and relentless striving for better standards to combat violence and harassment at work. Syria, despite the challenge, has been using best efforts to achieve SDG's, especially CG 8 with regard with decent work in economic development. In conclusion, we renew our wishes for this conference to achieve its best and to the return of the ILO to Syria after an almost complete absence over the past few years, and we renew our wishes for this conference to achieve the best outcomes. We are glad to announce our signing during this session of the Memorandum of Understanding with the ILO office in order to implement a plan to fight the worst forms of child labour, and we look forward to an effective return of the ILO to Syria. We renew our wishes for this conference to achieve the best of outcomes, thanking and appreciating the presidency of the ILO's and ILC office staff for all those who are committed to preparing this session's proceedings. Thank you.

Mr Puga

Worker (Panama)

Thank you very much, Mr Chairman. The Worker's delegation of Panama recognizes the great importance of the ideas set out in the memorandum of the Director-General on the initiative on women at work, the push for equality. At the same time, we welcome the view of the ILO of the importance of social dialogue and tripartism set out in Report 6 of the 107th International Labour Conference 2018. You cannot achieve social justice in our countries without equality in the world of work and in society, where the involvement of women in the labour market in Panama is 30 per cent less than is the figure for men. These inequalities persist in Panama to the detriment of sectors of population such as women and young people. Most of the labour force still do not enjoy freedom of association, collective bargaining and other labour rights. Gender inequality persists in market practices, which discriminate and deny rights to women, do not consider their work as equal and consider it rather as a product which is more subject to the laws of supply and demand, but you cannot continue paying less for work of equal value. Their work is in fact is made more expensive because they bear children and have domestic responsibilities. It's not easy to overcome these problems because many of them are deeply rooted in society and result in values which permeate a large number of companies and public and private organizations. We, therefore, need a huge awareness-raising campaign to combat these problems, at the same time as promoting more energetic labour inspection. We can no longer accept a situation where in Panama one in five private sector workers and 70 per cent of female domestic workers pay no health and social security contributions, which means they risk exclusion from retirement pension rights. In Panama, freedom of association and collective bargaining is an illusion for more than 80 per cent of salaried workers, and that's particularly true in key sectors such as banking and the public sector where there are serious infringements. Both in the state and the private sector there is a social debt to workers because the language which is used is often a way of weakening the legitimate aspirations of workers and exhausting the social partners by promoting undesirable practices which are borderline democratic and which go far beyond the formal statements of good intentions, which need to be converted into a process which has proper results. Two years ago was adopted a tripartite agreement, which was an initiative to recognize the rights of workers in the public sector, and despite that, there is still no approved body of legislation. Workers in Panama continue to hope for a spirit of commitment from the state, so as to achieve compliance with the eighth UN development objective and to move towards inclusive and sustainable economic growth, including full employment and decent work for all. Panama has seen increasing economic growth during the last decade and is now the second country for the worst distribution of wealth and income in Latin America, and rural poverty affects more than half of people, particularly in indigenous areas. In society in Panama, it's important that we establish wealth redistribution and that requires an effective commitment of the State to society to establish development policies which are a way towards major social justice. The workers of Panama reiterate our commitment to dialogue so as to construct a more prosperous future for all and a more decent equal society for all, and we repeat that at the beginning of the celebration of the ILO's centenary, which will see a renewal of our commitment to achieve social justice in the world. Thank you very much.

Mr Al-Saadi

Employer (Iraq)

In the name of God, most Merciful, most Compassionate. Your Excellencies, ladies and gentleman, the representatives of workers' and employers' organizations, ladies and gentlemen, let me start by congratulating you Mr President on the upcoming 100th anniversary of the ILO. I would also like to congratulate all my colleagues present here today, and I would to thank you for being present here so that we can discuss the Report of the Director-General and the different initiatives of the ILO. This a very serious task that we need to embark on in order to overcome the challenges facing the world of work, given the developments that we are witnessing in the world, these developments which impact productivity and impact welfare in the world. We would like to thank the ILO for the support it has provided to us and for helping us review our by-laws and our standing orders, so that those by-laws and standing orders are improved and so that we can provide the best service as possible to employers. Now when it comes to the Director-General's report regarding the situation of workers in the Arab occupied territories, we would like to condemn the decision taken by Government of the USA to move its embassy to the Arab city of Jerusalem. In clear defiance of the feelings of Muslims and Christians alike, this move will impact the business environment of Jerusalem and in the entire region, and we call upon the international community to provide more support to Palestinian employers because they are shouldering a very heavy burden under these exceptional circumstances. Ladies and gentlemen, the entire Middle East in general, and Iraq in particular, have witnessed over the past 25 years a number of conflicts and crises, starting with the Iraqi-Iranian back in 1980, and onto the 2003 war in Iraq and then to these attacks and aggressions by ISI. All these crises and conflicts have led to undermining life in our countries. They have destroyed our infrastructure, and they have left many women widowed and many children orphaned. It is very important for us to tackle the destruction that has been brought about by all these crises. Amongst the effects of such crises is the high unemployment levels in the Arab world, which currently stands at 10.2 per cent, that is to say double the world level. Our labour markets are very unstable because of the reduction in oil prices and because of instability and lack of security. Our Governments have had to provide a lot of funds in order to tackle these issues, and we have worked very hard in order to help those regions that were previously controlled by ISIS, because we have seen an increase in the informal economy in those regions, especially amongst young people, young people who constitute 19 per cent of the work force in Iraq. I would also like to say that unemployment amongst women is very high in Iraq because the labour market cannot provide appropriate job opportunities for women. We believe that it is very important to focus on the private sector to unleash its potential and to draft long-term policies in order to revive this private sector. This should be done in cooperation and coordination between workers and employers alike in order to respect their interests and also in order to take into account the different initiatives undertaken by the ILO. We in Iraq work in partnership with the Ministry of Labour, and we help that Ministry implement the National Employment Policy, which is a policy that we have helped update over the past period. The Government of Iraq has also ratified Convention 87 on the Freedom of Association. It has also drafted a strategy in order to promote the private sector. However, despite all these efforts, we believe that we need more concrete and comprehensive measures, a more concrete and comprehensive development plan, so that we can achieve decent work in Iraq. Decent work is a national need, and it is a precondition for achieving the Sustainable Development Goals. We also need better labour market governance. We need to reform our vocational training systems and to enhance social security coverage in order to increase the productivity of the private sector. We also need a national policy that takes into account the needs of the private sector, and also we need to tackle the increasing informal economy. Ladies and gentlemen, the National Development Plan that was drafted by Iraq for the period 2018–2022 was drafted in cooperation with the private sector. We hope that the private sector will be able to lead development efforts in the future. Iraq has also adopted a new mechanism in order to promote the diversification of our economy and in order to attract more investments, because we believe that investments is necessary, especially given the austerity policies implements and the lack of funds that we are witnessing in Iraq. The Government of Iraq has tried to attract as much investment as possible. It has attended and held a number of international conferences in order to attract investments and in order to provide more job opportunities. One of these conferences was the one held in Kuwait back in 2017, which aimed at preparing Iraq for the post-ISIS era. The private sector in Iraq is still hoping for a wider international response and for more international investments in Iraq so that the situation in this country would improve. At the end of my speech ... [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:51] So we look forward to more cooperation with the ILO. [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:57] Thank you for your attention.

Government (Malawi)

Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, firstly, I bring to the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference fraternal greetings from His Excellency the President of the Republic of Malawi, Professor Mutharika, and all of the people of Malawi, the Warm Heart of Africa. Mr President, let me congratulate you and your entire bureau on the well-deserved election to steer the deliberations of this important conference to successful conclusion. I would like to also to congratulate the Director-General for the well-researched and thoughtful reports. The Malawi delegation welcomes the reports. These will help us in dealing with salient issues including the structural reality that women remain marginalized at work. The Director-General's Women at Work Initiative report, the ILO centenary initiative on the Women at Work and the conference agenda item to address violence and harassment at work are all key in our quest to circumvent obstacles to gender inequality. Mr President, tackling gender inequality is at the heart of my country, Malawi, and we do recognize that gender equality is a basic human right, essential to having or achieving social justice. We have thus created enabling policies and legislations to promote gender equality. These include the Constitution of the Republic, the National Agenda Policy of 2016, the Gender Equality Act of 2013, Vision 2020 and the Malawi Growth and Development Strategy III. The aim is to ensure that Malawi becomes a more equal and fairer society, particularly for girls and women, and the agenda is mainstreamed in the national development process. The Gender Equality Act promotes equality, equal integration, influence empowerment, dignity and opportunities for men and women in all functions of society. It prohibits and provides redress for sex discrimination, harmful practices and sexual harassment, and provides for public awareness and promotion of gender equality. Other than gender specific instruments, Malawi has developed other useful tools such as a Youth Policy and a National Employment and Labour Policy to facilitate creation of decent employment and entry of young men and women into the labour market. Mr President, despite the enabling policy environment, gender inequality continues to manifest itself in many forms including wealth, health, education, employment and politics. It is for this reason that Malawi is one of the countries still ranked low on the UN Gender Inequality Index. Achieving women participation in the labour force is one of the critical issues that is of concern in my country. Unemployment among women is higher than that of men. We have therefore started to formalize the informal sector to create more space for decent job creation and to increase women's access to social security. Regarding the issue of gender pay gap, Mr President, we will have challenges to quantify the economic value of women household chores. It is common, therefore, to regard women's contribution at home as insignificant. Government of Malawi recently launched the 50:50 campaign to accelerate equal representation of women and men in decision-making positions in all areas of economic activity. Gender equality and women's empowerment is being mainstreamed into all developments efforts, including education, health, and we ensure that the budget is gender sensitive. I am particularly pleased by the employers' efforts and workers' cooperation to ensure increased women in decision-making positions. We have achieved positives outcomes regarding girls' access to training through community colleges established under the country's flagship programme. We have also made strides in girls' access to the reproductive health, schooling, and participation of women in economically productive activities. We have also started addressing gender-specific vulnerabilities due to climate change. To enhance awareness, we are scaling grassroots advocacy through collaborative work with all stakeholders. In conclusion, Mr President, I once again thank the Director-General for the elaborate reports and take this opportunity to call upon the ILO to continue providing technical support to member States, including my country Malawi, to achieve gender equality. Mr President, delegates, I thank you for your attention.

---

Mr Mailhos

Employer (Uruguay)

Mr Chairman, delegates, ladies and gentlemen. The importance and relevance of the subjects dealt with by this International Labour Conference call for some input from the point of view of the employers' sector in Uruguay. The first one refers to the memorandum of the Director-General on Women at Work: The push for equality promoted by the ILO. In Uruguay, as in other countries, the position of women at work is different from the general thrust of the memorandum from the Director-General. If we look specifically at the wage gap, for example, we find that in Uruguay the law expressly prohibits any type of discrimination based on gender, which obviously includes pay. If we look at the statistics for the salaries of men and women in our country, and we take into account working time, we find that the gap is significantly reduced and therefore much smaller than set out in the memorandum, and that in fact there are sectors where women's salaries are greater than those of men. These statistics from the Ministry of Employment show that the wage gap is only of the order of 6.1 per cent. We also need to look at the importance of university education. University education at present is a precursor of better employment conditions, and in our country almost 70 per cent of students at university are women. We know that there is still a great deal to do to promote the rights and dignity of women, but we believe that we are on the right road. These examples are a way of pointing out two things to the ILO. First, the global activities of the ILO must be designed with sufficient flexibility to give priority importance to those situations which are unacceptable for women and situations in which many women find themselves. There are countries where the role of women, and indeed there are many such countries, the role of women is increasing in importance, and that is a challenge that we are still facing. It's necessary to bring about qualitative and quantitative improvement in the data available so as to have a better grasp of the reality and to be able to frame the best policies. Mr Chairman, the second point we wish to raise is related to the social dialogue and tripartism, which was the subject of the Director-General's memorandum and is the subject of a special committee of the conference. We are aware of the benefits of tripartism and how it can be used as a social tool for building social peace. We also know that it's a very difficult job to achieve genuinely tripartite agreements, and that is clearly a feature of the tripartite bodies of which we are a member. We must remember that the tools are there to do the job, and we have to ensure that we deal with the most representative organizations, and we have to work with those organizations which take into account the interests of workers and also of employers. We therefore have to remember that in procedural terms what we're driving for is results, and we have to remember that there are still tripartite proceedings of the ILO in Uruguay, particularly under Convention 908, and it's been nine years now that we still fail to find a solution or a way of resolving these complaints from the ILO monitoring bodies in the case of 2699. We hope that this is not tantamount to paralysis, and it's appropriate to remember that Convention 98 has not been the subject of any new proceedings or inquires against Argentina. We hope, therefore, that the ILO will help us to find an effective solution to this case and that we will continue to play our full part in this organization. We hope, Chairman, that governments, workers and employers will continue to pursue the spirit of tripartism in their policies, in their speeches and in particular in practice. Thank you very much.

Mr Giuma

Government (Libya)

... giving us greater equality. Of course, there have been many questions raised about women at work. The report shows that the women's participation rate in the world of work is at 30 per cent, and of course, women are paid 20 per cent less per month than men. These are figures which show us that women are still discriminated against in the world of work. The report concludes that millions of women in the developing world, especially in rural zones, are in low-income situations. Infrastructure, communications and roads, as well as activities to encourage them into work which are well organised, are severely required. This would lead to decent work for women. We have taken the initiative to adopt legislation in my country to improve the participation rate of women in the world of work and respecting women's needs, especially in terms of maternity. At the national level, we adopted Resolution 210 to encourage women into the world of work through specific policies, whilst respecting their economic social rights. Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, the Libyan delegation supports the statements made by the Director-General in his report and calls upon the ILO to create workshops and seminars in its programme in order to encourage equality between women and men in countries such as Libya. Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, during the 103rd conference, the Director-

General's report was on the subject of migration. We have worked hard to improve the situation for workers in the formal and informal economy. We are a transit country for many migrants. We must not forget the tragedy in the Mediterranean because of the tens of thousands of migrants who illegally cross the sea to get to Europe. We are a country which sees large numbers of migrants transiting. We have provided food and lodgings for these migrants. However, we do not have enough staff or resources to cover the large flows of people. Other countries around us are also trying to help these migrants. Of course, we understand the reasons that people leave their homeland, poverty, conflict, and other countries need the manpower, but as a consequence, the international community must increase its regional and international efforts to bring an end to this phenomena and its deep root causes. They should finance development programmes to bring an end to poverty and the situations which affect a large number of people who become migrants. With the assistance of the ILO for sustainable development, Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, for the second consecutive year Libya is on the individual list in the commission on the Application of Standards. We gave information in the last session, so we are surprised to see our name on this list again. Of course, we are going through a very difficult transition period. We count upon the support of ILO rather than a calling to account. We stand firm with those countries who would like to see reform in the Committee on the Application of Standards in order to ensure transparency and the tripartite structure of this organization. Thank you. We would also like to talk about the situation of workers in Palestine. They are stripped of their right to organize and their civil rights are violated.

Government (Iraq)

Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen, President of the Conference, I shall like to congratulate the President and also the Vice-President on your elections to this important conference which is being held here in Geneva at a complicated time, which includes a number of violations and acts of provocation which the people of the world are victim of. There is the issue of the [vgr INAUDIBLE 1:02] occupation against Palestinian civilians and, indeed, this constitutes a genocide that has negative consequences on the labour sector and also on economic activities. The world is getting ready for the centenary initiative which will be launched in 2019 by the ILO during its 109th Session. Of course, the Director-General underscored the importance of supporting the labour market and the digital initiatives to support employment policies to reform the labour market so that it takes into account training and teaching and skills upgrading training. In this context, the development plan in Iraq is focused on strategic objectives concerning good governance and also the economic reform of the country in all of the fields and, of course, the rehabilitation of our country after the act of terrorism that our citizens have experienced. We have also invested in various sectors, namely the economy. We have updated programmes to deal with unemployment, to deal with poverty and to increase our development indicators and also to strengthen decentralization. The development programmes that we have updated through our Government seek to tackle poverty, unemployment, marginalization and violence, and, of course our armed forces have been able to end the atrocities carried out by the criminal groups of Daesh and active terrorism. Of course, we have updated our plans to deal with acts of terrorism, and we have also adopted a recommendation on dealing with disasters and poverty and to update development whilst respecting sustainable development and fundamental human rights. Consequently, we highlighted our needs for the post-Daesh period for the rehabilitation of our country for resilience and resistance and for decent work and for cooperation. First of all, rehabilitation of infrastructure is vital in the liberated zones. We also need to guarantee youth employment. We need to find solutions to child labour. We need to reconstruct businesses, and we also need to form social partnerships in order to ensure that sustainable development can be achieved, and we also have an investment period for the post-conflict period. Of course, the social dimension of development is very important. We have updated programmes concerning the liberated areas to guarantee coverage for 5 million citizens, and also we have a conditional aid programme for one region. We have deployed great efforts in terms of social coverage and social protection. Of course, we try to cover new groups of workers in the informal economy, and we have also tried to cover entrepreneurs who can sign up to social security on a voluntary basis. We pay tribute to the regional office in Beirut, and we analysed the labour market in Iraq to deploy efforts in keeping with the relevant Conventions of the ILO. I thank you very much.

Worker (Colombia)

Madam Chair, on behalf of the workers of Columbia, we welcome the calling of the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference, and we would like to positively comment on the initiative of Women at Work as an initiative, a push for equality, and we would like to thank the Director-General for this august assembly. The report reflects on the situation of women at work. There are significant efforts that need to be made, and the report explains which Conventions and Recommendations promote equality, especially in terms of equity of gender around the world. Despite this, it has not been possible to overcome fully discrimination, violence and exclusion, which have deep causes in the history of humanity. In Columbia, we are living a very crucial and cross-cutting stage of our history which relates directly to the Director-General's report linked to human rights. The ILO's Constitution recognizes work as a fundamental human right and rejects that this become an item for barter. The right to work, over time, should be strengthened but with specific emphasis on women. In November 2016, the peace agreement was signed between the Columbian Government and the FARC Guerrillas. After 50 years of violence, different expressions around the world, different institutions declared this to be exemplary. The workers of Columbia agree with this statement, but we continue to call upon the international community and the world of work to continue to build the conditions for this agreement to be respected and implemented fully, but in the same vein, that this process of dialogue be respected at a national level. We also call for a state policy, which is serious and binding, to overcome definitively violence in our country of criminal gangs which have claimed, and still do occupy, areas of territory which fall outside of the peace agreement. With the success of the peace agreement, despite this, we are still living through and we must overcome the true building of peace through the elimination of physical and psychological violence against women, discrimination. Despite their rights existing on paper, they must exist in reality in the world of work. Tripartism is extremely important and must continue to build the road to create a place for women in the world of work, in economic life and in public political life. Finally, our call goes beyond this. We want to see the conditions in the world of work and changes in working culture so that women can adapt to the world of work that was built for, and by, men. We call for the end of aberration and violence against women. Of course, we need to overcome the idea that women look after families and men bring home the bacon. In the same vein, people, women and men, must be agents for change, and the ILO will be able to celebrate its 100th anniversary. The ILO should work from the principle that the future of work that we want to see has no future in violence or harassment against women or anyone and that there is no space for inequality because of gender. Thank you very much.

Government (Burundi)

Madam President of this meeting, delegates, on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Burundi and on behalf of the tripartite delegation of Burundi, it is a great pleasure for me to address this august assembly to express my views on the projects that my country is implementing in the field of decent work for all. First of all, I am very proud to be able to join my previous speakers in conveying my sincere congratulations and thanks to the ILO, and especially to the Director-General and his governing body, on the marvellous work they have done throughout the world and which transpires in the documents and reports submitted to the ILC. Madam President, ladies and gentlemen, delegates, in collaboration with the various departments of the ILO, the various technical and financial partners and the social partners, specific actions have been undertaken and are still being undertaken by the Government of Burundi. Indeed, with a view to improving and modernizing our legislation on labour, the Government of Burundi, together with our social partners, continues the process of revising the labour code in order to make it more modern and to adapt it to the current context and to make it in line with the other codes in the country and to make it in keeping with regional regulation and in keeping with international laws and international standards and practices recommended by the ILO. After the adoption of a national policy on employment in 2014, and after its dissemination in 2017, the Government of Burundi has just finalised a national strategy and action plan for its implementation. The Government is committed to resolving the problem of unemployment, and appropriate measures are being taken, in particular the development of teaching and technical and vocational training in keeping with the demands of the labour market, and the establishment of mechanisms for socio professional insertion for graduates. In this context, legal texts that put in place a youth employment pool has just been adopted by the Government and the two Chambers. This youth pool will provide excellent opportunities and conditions for financing and assistance for job creation projects for young people. Along these lines, projects are being developed at a national level in sectors with employment potential. As a matter of priority, I am referring to the agribusiness sector, the energy sector, the public work sectors, ICT and tourism. In the field of social protection, we have made great strides forward. We have crafted and adopted a National Policy on Social Protection, and we also have a strategy for its implementation. A standing Executive Secretariat for social protection has been established. It is now up and running. It takes action in favour of the population. This is a reality in our country. Now turning to aspects of gender equality in the world of work, the principle of quotas with regard to representation for women in various institutions has been established in our country and women must represent at least 30 per cent of the workforce. In terms of social dialogue, after signing the Charter of Social Dialogue between the Government of Burundi and the social partners, backed up by the establishment of a national committee on social dialogue and with its standing Executive Committee, this body has already produced tangible results in the field of prevention and the resolution of labour disputes, both within the public sector and within the private sector. President, ladies and gentlemen, delegates, in conclusion, with this, working in collaboration with the ILO, drawing on its experience, drawing on its expertise, support and its assistance of a technical nature, Burundi intends to have achieved positive results in improving the labour conditions of its citizens by the celebration of the centenary of our organization which we will be celebrating next year. In addition to the topics that I have just mentioned, clearly we will be talking about the progress made in terms of our implementation on our national policy on wages which is based on the cultivation of jobs and functions, which is a document that we are currently putting together. I thank you very much.

Mr Hinojosa Rodriguez

Government (The Plurinational State of Bolivia)

Madam President, first of all let me, on behalf of the Plurinational State of Bolivia, give our regards to the 107th International Labour Conference. This is a space for reflection in order to achieve a world without physical walls, legal walls or mental or invisible walls, a world without discrimination and racism, without violence and without war. We are, of course, severely concerned by what is happening in Syria, Palestine, Venezuela and Nicaragua where the pain of these people, through the violence that they suffer by foreign powers, is painful to all of us. The topic of this conference is an impetus to push for equality for women in the world of work. Without the liberation of women, there is no social liberation. This is why our Government is developing rules and policies in favour of women, having put together social protection laws which are effective for women through changes in our state, political constitution and through the entire legislative framework, which includes the concepts of protection, equality and democratic equity for women. Amongst the advances we can note those that have been made to guarantee women a life without violence, without harassment and without political violence and against human trafficking. We must also say that Bolivia is the second country in the world to achieve gender equality in the political sphere. However, we must continue to work to bring down the patriarchy. Bolivia is amongst the 20 best countries in the world in terms of gender inequality, as shown by the World Economic Forum in 2017. The Plurinational State of Bolivia also forbids anyone from holding public office if they have a history of domestic violence against their wife or any member of their family. The result is that the Bolivian State promotes full wage equality between men and women as a way of bringing down the patriarchal system through strengthening the benefits granted by law to ensure maternity leave, by creating mechanisms and policies to bring down infant mortality and the death of women in child birth. The State is guaranteeing women rights, life, health, education, maternity leave and working conditions of equality. These achievements are part of the revolutionary transformation which has improved the conditions of the lives of all Bolivian men and women. Our development model is our own. It is sovereign and independent, and its results are clear. Gross domestic product has increased since 2005 by $9.5 billion to more than $37 billion per year. Gross national product per capita increased from $1,037 in 2005 to $3,393 in 2017. That is an increase of three times. There is stable growth of businesses with 116,855 registered in 2010, increasing to 295,829 in 2017. That is an increase of more than 180,000 businesses in eight years. These are all contributing to create decent and sustainable jobs. Extreme poverty has reduced from 38.2 per cent to 17.9 per cent, lifting 3 million Bolivians into the middle class, constituting 30 per cent of our population. In 2005 the minimum wage was 440 Bolivianos (BOB). That's $63. At the moment it's 2060 BOB, or $295. It's increased four-fold, but it is still not enough for some family needs. In Bolivia, the unemployment rate is currently at 4.48 per cent, which is one of the lowest rates despite the fact that many countries are experiencing increasing rates. Bolivia in the international community can be seen not only by its optimistic economic outlook, but also because of its economic stability and social and political stability. [vgr INTERRUPTION 5:55] however, economic depression and political backsliding by brother countries. We will continue to make efforts to improve our development ... [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:11]

Government (United Republic of Tanzania)

Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, at the outset I wish to join the others who have spoken before me in congratulating you, Mr President, Vice-President and all other members of the Bureau, on your well-deserved elections to preside over the deliberations of this session. I have no doubt that you and your entire team will steer the work of this august gathering into fruitful conclusions. Mr President, I also commend Mr Guy Ryder, ILO Director-General, for a detailed report on the ILO programme implementation 2016-17. The report encourages and it provides a positive direction to the member States in promoting and improving the implementation of Decent Work strategies. My delegation is of the view that these reports have clearly depicted achievements, lessons learnt and challenges encountered by the Office and member States in the realization and promotion of Decent Work Agenda and the gender equality at work in particular. Mr President, despite the achievement mentioned in the reports, as a result of the significant resources deployed to member States, still there are labour market challenges in terms of youth unemployment, low social protection coverage, weak environment for social dialogue and the compliance to labour standards. The situation suggests that the achievements in terms of launching labour market policies and plans into strategies are not sufficient enough to address the labour market challenges, in particular, youth unemployment and other decent work deficits. There is more to be done in terms of implementation of policies, plans and strategies. In this context, it is therefore imperative for the ILO, at all levels, to mobilize more resources to support the implementation processes of the policies, plans and strategies. Mr President, I wish to report that the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania and the Revolutionary Government of Zanzibar are committed to continue working with the ILO in addressing decent work deficits in our country. Our focus has been on developing and implementing plans and strategies on skills development, child labour and social protection, to mention a few. In the last financial year, 2017-18, with the ILO technical assistance, through our national skills development programme more than 11,500 disadvantaged youths acquired skills through internship, apprenticeship and recognition of prior learning. As a majority of them have been able to secure decent employment. Mr President, in order to address the social protection challenges that include governance, low benefits, low coverage and sustainability of the schemes, we have recently enacted Public Service Social Security Fund Act of 2018. Among other things, the Act merged the five pension schemes that exist in Tanzania mainland into two schemes: one for private and informal sectors, and another one for public sector. On the other hand, the Revolutionary Government of Zanzibar remains with the one social security fund which covers both public and private sectors. The merging process was tripartite and inclusive in nature, and the same has also been reflected in the composition of the body of trustees of the newly formed schemes. Mr President, the Fifth Phase Government of Tanzania, under the leadership of His Excellency, Dr John Joseph Magufuli, has embarked on the industrialization process. This is informed from the fact that Tanzania is an agriculture country where more than 80 per cent of its people depend on for their livelihoods. Adding value to its products is imperative in the creation of sustainable employment opportunities. ILO is better placed to support Tanzania in this endeavour in order to reduce unemployment rates. Mr President, in conclusion, I wish to reaffirm the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania in our tripartite partners' commitment to adhere to labour standard principles with a view to achieving decent work to ensure no one is left behind. I thank you all for your kind attention.

Mr Al-Bawi

Worker (Iraq)

In the name of God, the Most Holy Compassionate, Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen, Head of delegation, Mr Director-General of the International Labour Organization, Madam President, ladies and gentlemen. I have the pleasure of giving you the regards of the people of Iraq, and we wish you all the very best of success to ensure that the Conventions and Recommendations of this conference are able to overcome the dramatic situation which workers in conflict zones, especially in the occupied Arab territories where there is a genocide taking place by Zionist occupiers. Madam President, we have discussed with the Minister of Social Affairs as well as the Iraqi Federation of Industry and we work together in a framework of democracy and social dialogue. We have a work policy which has been put into place with the social partners and this for the post- Islamic State Daesh era after the crimes committed by this organization built on peace and stability. Of course, our trade unions have adopted policies to move forward. We have also taken part and improved our labour legislation, as well as labour inspections and social security. Madam President, ladies and gentlemen, our Federation in 2018 has cooperated with the Government, which has updated a resolution in order to improve the implementation of a Convention which was adopted by the Government and this in order to bolster union work and unions and their place in social and economic life. The principles and fundamental rights at work and its framework are very important. We have taken measures against child labour, against forced labour. Of course, has seen principles adopted to put into place a tripartite structure, which is extremely important within the ILO, in order to organize the labour market. This will allow us to implement the principles of health and safety at work. The Director-General's report mentions the rights of women at work and the importance of adopting an instrument against violence and harassment at work. In conclusion, our delegation would like to wish you all the very best of success. Thank you very much.

Mr Camara

Employer (Guinea)

Madam President of the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference, ladies and gentlemen, Vice-Presidents of the Conference, President of the Governing Body, Director-General of the International Labour Office, ladies and gentlemen, distinguished delegates of governments, employers and workers, ladies and gentlemen, President of the Governing Body. On behalf of the private sector in Guinea, I shall like to congratulate you on your election to the helm of this session, and I shall like to wish you every success in discharging your duties. The employers of Guinea have analysed and considered very carefully the various topics on our agenda which look at the concerns and relations between partners in the world of work. The employers of Guinea endorse the conclusions of the report of the President of the Governing Body and the Report of the Director-General. We encourage them to establish more follow-up and evaluation mechanisms that are vital for their implementation. Now, whilst all of the topics have indeed grasped our attention, the topic on the effective action of the ILO for cooperation and support of the Sustainable Development Goals, the SDGs, and the topic on violence and harassment against men and women in the world of work grasp our attention in particular. They will therefore be at the heart of our action in the future. However, allow me, ladies and gentlemen, to draw your attention to one major difficulty that the organization that I am representing has been facing for a decade now. Indeed, my confederation, as the most representative employers' organization in Guinea, is facing one incomprehensible circumstance. Namely, the fact that we are not members of the International Organisation of Employers, IOE. Now, with regard to the appropriateness and convergence between the various services that it provides to its members and the needs of Guinean employers, it is our resolve to join the IOE, and this resolve is strong and legitimate. It is vital to record here that during the last quarter of 2015, the Government of Guinea, in a bid to highlight the work done on the ground by the employers' organizations, carried out an evaluation involving all of the employers in Guinea. The results speak for themselves. This makes our organization the most representative one in Guinea, and we have seats in all of the tripartite commissions and organizations in our country. Madam President, Director-General of the ILO, ladies and gentlemen, you will understand clearly that our major concern is to allow thousands of employers who guarantee social protection to thousands of workers throughout the world to benefit from the largest employers' network, to benefit from technical cooperation, participation in conferences, workshops, seminars, interactive platforms, etc. I should like to reassure you that we are determined to become a member of the IOE to make a contribution to the world of work. We hope that this advocacy on the part of the Guinean employers will finally be subject to an objective review of our situation, and, therefore I should like to reiterate to you, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, the readiness of my confederation to always make a modest contribution to the initiatives and the efforts deployed to make the world of work the safest way that leads to the enjoyment and flourishing of human rights. I thank you very much.

Government (Lebanon)

Your Excellency Madam President, Lebanon is proud of its membership in ILO since 1948. Lebanon is determined to fulfil its commitments under the 50 labour Conventions it has ratified, and this is based on our belief in the lofty goals for which this organization was established and in order to preserve the fundamental rights of workers without which no sustainable development can take place. We commend the ongoing cooperation between Lebanon and the ILO Regional Office in Beirut that includes many projects. Namely, the Employment-Intensive Infrastructure Programme and the Decent Work Country Programme 2017-2020. A Memorandum of Understanding was signed lately, but we are still in need of funding from donor countries, and we should like to recall another important programme, which is the National Action Plan to Eliminate the Worst Forms of Child Labour, that covers all areas in Lebanon, which started with a survey and led to the amendment of national legislations in line with labour Conventions that are relevant to combating child labour. An annex about the situation of Syrian refugee children has been prepared as well. Lebanon is faced with tremendous challenges that prevent the strengthening of social justice and securing decent work conditions, the most tragic of which is the repercussion of a regional crisis that imposed a million and a half Syrian refugees on Lebanon. This has a negative impact on infrastructure and on all sectors, particularly the unemployment rate and informal labour. Lebanon has reached its breaking point, and there should be more international tangible support to Lebanon. The Cedar Donor Conference was a milestone in this regard for the strengthening of the economy of Lebanon and its stability. Many loans and assistance were pledged during this conference to fund investment projects over the next five years. In this regard, we appreciate ILO's assistance to Syrian refugees in Lebanon, but we reiterate the principled position of Lebanon not to integrate or resettle refugees in host societies. A long-lasting solution for the refugee crisis would be the return of those refugees to safe zones in their countries of origin. The Lebanese Government is determined to secure social justice. To this end, the technical assistance to support promotion of social dialogue, a project was launched under the supervision of the Ministry of Labour and in cooperation with the social partners, and it is also funded by the European Union. In line with the agenda of ILO, Lebanon gives gender parity utmost priority and deploys extensive efforts to combat unequal pay. The laws governing work in the public sector do not discriminate between the sexes in labour. We are working on overcoming some loopholes in legislations for the private sector. In this regard, we should like to recall that a draft bill was submitted to the House of Representatives by the Minister of State for Women Affairs on December 19, 2017 in order to amend some of the provisions of the Social Security Act to secure gender parity. As for sexual harassment, the Ministry for Women Affairs is preparing a draft bill to punish sexual harassment in the workplace, and the House of Representatives is about to enact it. As we meet here today, unprecedented violence and escalation is taking place against the helpless Palestinian people. We have viewed with a great deal of concern the Report of the Director-General entitled The situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, which shows the extent of Israeli violations of the rights of Palestinian workers. Ignoring these breaches will only lead to more oppression, and we call on this conference to adopt firm and bold stances to oblige Israel to restore the legitimate rights of Palestinian workers. In this regard, we should like also to recall the suffering of Lebanese workers and farmers who live in areas adjacent to Palestine, who are in danger of unexploded cluster bombs due to the Israeli aggression on Lebanon in 2006 and also are threatened by the stationed Israeli forces near the borders, and this leads to instability. In conclusion, this ILC coincides with the 20th anniversary of the adoption of the 1998 Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work. I should like to recall the cornerstone of this declaration which is synergy between the four main categories of principles that constitute decent work. One cannot be achieved without the other. Thank you very much, Madam President.

Mr Huarachi Quispe

Worker (The Plurinational State of Bolivia)

Thank you, Madam President. This is the first time that I have been here, and I am very happy to be here, but I'd like to express the thinking and the feelings of the workers of Bolivia. It's very important to understand the history of the workers' movement in Bolivia. In 1950, our female comrades did not have the right to vote. In 1952, a large manifestation of workers showed their opinion, and for the first time, women were allowed to vote and could exercise their democratic rights under the state Constitution, but through the twists of time, women have always been treated badly with de facto dictatorships. They have been massacred in mining camps where many workers, women and men, have paid the ultimate price. It's also important to recognize, thanks to the organization of workers and of the ILO, to see them acquire rights through armed struggle when necessary. We can now see women joining unions and creating a true tool in the workers' movement. For we, the Bolivian workers, it is important to stand firm and to highlight who suffers around the world in different labour sectors. It is unfortunate to see, and we regret to see, the various expressions of pain that we have heard today, and we stand shoulder to shoulder with those people. The great transformation that Bolivia has gone through, and the progress and the experience that we are experiencing, is thanks both to our struggle and to the organization of workers in our country. In the next decade, there will be many privatizations, but there were people who were living in the street but they fought and the women fought alongside them. In 2003, there was the great fight for gas. One comrade gave her life in the street. She was brought down by the de facto Government at the time. She was shot in the area of Patacamaya. Throughout history, women have been a very important part and a constant part of the transformation of Bolivian society. They have allowed us to consolidate a new Constitution in our country. Today, Bolivia is still going through struggle, but it is seeing this transformation in the construction of a new political constitution which incorporates women to ensure that they are part of the political structure of the Government, part of the unionist structure and in all areas. We would like this progress and experiences that we have lived, and are still living, to continue, but it is not enough. There is the need to keep working, to keep struggling and to keep passing laws, both within the politics of the state and at the same time, there is the need certainly to continue to incorporate women comrades into various different political spheres as well as the unions. I think the experience that we are sharing with you today shows you that comrades can earn their rights, and they can achieve the rights that they are due. We have achieved stipends for women who have been abandoned. It is an economic support, and it also helps them support their families. We've been working alongside women to achieve this, but this has not been our only struggle. We've also been fighting for children. We've also been fighting for students. [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:07] These are the achievements that we have made as workers, and that's not all. No, the workers' struggle is permanent, and I would like to reiterate ... [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:26]

Government (Madagascar)

Madam President, it is an honour for me to take the floor before this august assembly on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Madagascar and my delegation. I should like to congratulate the President on his election to the helm of this session. I should also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for the quality of his report. I should like to express to them our trust, and they can rest assured of the frank collaboration of my delegation as they discharge their noble mission. I would like to take this opportunity today to tell you about the major efforts and worthy efforts of Madagascar since the advent of the Fourth Republic of Madagascar, as we strive to promote decent work in the country, and this in a special partnership that we enjoy with the organization. Indeed, as set forth in the National Development Plan, and within the framework of our Economic Reform Programme, the country has undertaken great efforts to promote decent work, which is a major goal in the promotion of inclusive and lasting development and in the fight against poverty. Despite the negative effects of the current dual crisis, Madagascar continues to implement its Decent Work Country Programme, DWCP, together with the ILO. In this context, the promotion of social dialogue at a tripartite and bipartite level is at the heart of our ambitious project in a country that is currently ranked amongst one of the poorest in the world to do so. Our National Labour Council has recently been reactivated through a decree to re-establish, to promote and to encourage effect of social dialogue. At 70 per cent, all of the tripartite and bipartite structures in the world that work in Madagascar are currently up and running and operational to better address the issue of underemployment, unemployment and informal employment. Our Government is investing on an ongoing basis in various promotions, and we are focusing on private investment. We are focusing on PPPs. We're focusing on self-employment and on decent incomes. We benefit from a governance project with the ILO, and this project has enabled us to promote assistance that is sorely required by microenterprises, SMEs, etc, within our country. Moreover, our Government is striving to take appropriate measures for workers and their families. On the one hand, to improve the minimum level of services provided by the Health Service and also to improve social protection. And on the other hand, we are progressively extending the same services to categories of people who do not enjoy coverage. Given the scale of the poverty situation, given the scale of a lack of decent work, given the scale of the informal economy, which is gaining ground in our country, our goal is to develop decent work, decent work that respects regulations and the rights of all. We are making particular efforts, and we're doing so on an ongoing basis with a view to making more effective our labour legislation and improving our social legislation in general. Training and capacity building for labour inspection agents has been an issue we feel strongly about. Our labour inspectors have met on several occasions to exchange views and have met in workshops in order to discuss the issue of the informal economy and to develop and adopt appropriate intervention methods. Particular attention is, of course, given by our inspection agents to the dissemination and effective and progressive observation by these actors of the Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work. Of course, the various measures we have taken in Madagascar have duly taken into account the provisions of Recommendation 204 of the ILO. We still have a great deal of work to do in this field, but the first results are significant, and indeed they've already been achieved when it comes to the fight against informality, when it comes to appropriating the Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, when it comes to the promotion of decent work. By way of conclusion, and in the hope of having a better world, with your indulgence, allow me to wish success to the work of this session. I thank you for your kind attention.

---

Employer, Egypt

In the name of God, most Gracious, most Merciful, Your Excellency President of the ILC, Your Excellency Director-General of ILO, Excellencies, Ministers, Ambassadors, Members of delegations in the 107th ILC, peace be upon you all. We meet in this august assembly as representatives of our societies and groups, and we are cooperating for the well-being of our countries and the world as a whole, looking forward and hoping for peace and prosperity on earth. The choice of subjects for the technical committees this year, namely violence and harassment in the world of work, social dialogue and tripartism development cooperation, is a very timely one. Our societies are faced with many problems linked to these issues. It is high time we reconsider them, we discuss them and this in an attempt to adopt Conventions and Recommendations linked to them. The Arab world and the Middle East is marred by many problems created by the enemies of peace and prosperity and stability on the false pretext of democracy. These abject forces cooperate with terrorism and it supports its objectives and its agendas, and my country, Egypt, was fortunate enough to overcome terrorism that sometimes comes in the form of religious, political or confessional arguments, but all these are lies. Employers and workers should support their governments in ridding their countries of this scourge so that peace and security can prevail. Ladies and gentlemen, Egypt is amongst the first countries to join this organization and the United Nations. We are committed to participating in the meetings and conferences of this organization, and we disassociate ourselves from any act of aggression or interference in the affairs of others. We respect treaties that we sign. As one of the most ancient civilizations in the world, Egypt is [vgr INAUDIBLE 2:55], an Arab, an Islamic, a Christian and Afro-Asian, a Mediterranean and a Middle Eastern country. No country in the world can boast such diversity and as many identities. We, as employers, are active members of the General Union of Arab Chambers of Commerce and Industry. We are members of the Islamic Chamber of Commerce and Industry, and we are founding members of the Union of African Chambers of Commerce Industry Agriculture and Professions. We are also members of the Association of Euro-Med Chambers of Commerce. All these are part and parcel of our efforts in order to be fully integrated in the international business society and form more relationship between peoples of the world for peace and prosperity. In the words of the late Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser, "Egypt is a country that protects, does not threaten." It upholds justice for itself and for neighbouring countries within its capacities and reach. In conclusion, I should like to remind you that there is a people suffering from the worst type of racism and occupation at the hands of a bunch of lowlifes. This is the Arab Palestinian people, and we would like to reaffirm that there will come a time when this injustice, this aggression, this occupation will end. The night is darkest before the dawn. Until we meet again, I bid you farewell. Thank you for your kind attention.

Employer (Romania)

Director-General, dear friends and colleagues, structural change in Europe over the last few years are a reality and nobody can deny it. The current situation puts us in a position where we must concentrate on what makes up actually half the population of the European continent, namely women, and their role in the labour process. Far be it from us to conclude that there is legislation or a single European practice in the way that women are treated, both as employees in businesses and in public administration. There are a few cases where women and men are given equal treatment and where their competencies are taken into account. Obviously, in Romania, all these situations are well known and efforts are being made to try and make things work effectively. As an employers' confederation with an important role in a national area, we do what we can to try and find tripartite solutions, including having our role to play in legislation when the Government introduces it. We also are wanting to ensure a competitive and stable and predictable economy. In our opinion, the implementation of these objectives mean that we have to bring in women in work at all levels, not only working but also at decision making levels. In this context, we have to find solutions to take account of the social legislation which exists and to deal with matters which are of major importance. We are sure that technological development is such that we cannot always follow the work in such a way that we can take account of the victims of unfair treatment. At high levels of technology, we have to do what we can to ensure that suppliers are given the necessary education. We have to take account of the difficulties that our continent has gone through and that workers do not know how they can increase their revenue. There have been no increases in salary in some cases for more than a decade, so we have to take account of all this in what we do when we look at our own generation and what we are doing to try and increase the possibility for fair conditions for all. We have to take account of the characteristics of work and social legislation in place. We are trying to take account of the situation, and we as employers realize that we're not only those who criticize them, we are, of course, part of the problem as well. We have gained a lot of experience over the years, and we really have to ensure that we make sufficient efforts to play our role in ensuring a future for Europe so that we can be a model of progress and wellbeing for the world as a whole. Thank you for your attention.

Mr Weerasinghe

Employer (Sri Lanka)

The Employers' Federation of Ceylon extends its highest consideration to the Vice-President presiding, congratulate the Director-General for his report, and place our appreciation to the Employers Activities Bureau for its continued support. Excellencies and distinguished delegates, as the EFC celebrates 90 years of service to employers in Sri Lanka, we take pride in having implemented proactive measures to prevent industrial disputes, promote social dialogue, as well as create an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises to thrive, despite many challenges. The EFC's commitment to tripartism is firmly rooted in the organization's value proposition and reflected in the interventions that we have supported over the years. This year, we extended our support to successfully complete Sri Lanka's seventh Decent Work Country Programme. The director of the ILO in Sri Lanka and her colleagues well facilitated this initiative. EFC members employ approximately 35 per cent of the total employed in the formal private sector. This number is much higher if you were to include our partners. The Secretariat continues to offer portfolio services, and new services include a Diploma in Employment Relations, launched in collaboration with in the ITC campus in Turin. We remain a source technical expertise for employers' organizations. The EFC is at the forefront of formulating progressive employment policy and have a zero tolerance policy against all forms of discrimination and abuse at the workplace, including violence and sexual harassment targeting women. We continue to promote these values through codes of conduct and intend in launching gender audits as a new service benefiting employers. It is incumbent upon us to accommodate new trends of employment, including diverse forms of work. Steering employers to successfully transform businesses and take full advantage of opportunities offered by the digital economy, is of paramount importance. In doing so, accommodating work-life balance values is equally important. As a believer in the principle that no one should be left behind, we have extended our cooperation to workers and their representatives to work on the challenges that we are likely to contend with during any transition. Similarly, we have commenced offering meaningful services to our regional partners. The MSMEs is a segment that contributes approximately 54 per cent of GDP, and many of these entrepreneurs are in a transitional phase. A recent EFC initiated deliberation on the informal economy has given us much needed insight on how we should approach in assisting those operating in this sector. We are also working with National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health to promote the universal adherence of workers standards in the country to a certification that will be of value even to micro and the self employed. Similarly, the EFC has positioned many interventions directed at achieving Sri Lanka's Social Development Goals. Our support for the National Skills Programme, promoting certification of recognition of prior learning, based on the NVQ system, is a good example. The proposed introduction of a skills passport will facilitate the recognition of skills as well as enable workers to benefit from better work opportunities locally as well as overseas. The EFC supports the Global Compact on Migration and have also called on authorities to facilitate greater EO to EO cooperation, in receiving and sending states, to strengthen national initiatives and ensure orderly migration and create better working conditions. We are committed to work in partnership with stakeholders, both in public and private sector, in promoting sustainable and inclusive enterprises. The Employers' Network on Disability of the EFC continues to assist persons with disabilities to enhance their competencies and to find jobs. The dedicated resource centre has been recognized worldwide as a model and now conducts services such as orientation and programmes and access audits for employers. The Employers' National Network on Youth Initiatives, which draws inspiration from the GAN, can be cited as another initiative aimed at alleviating the social economic conditions of vulnerable segments, especially youth. Having involvement in education policy setting is multipronged. Aside from sharing information pertaining to demand side and developing curricular, we guide young persons to take advantage of the opportunities afforded by the private sector. In conclusion, I wish to thank the IOE, all our overseas partners, including the ITC campus in Turin, Keidanren and HIDA as well as the Dutch Employers' Corporation Programme for their continued assistance in enhancing EFC capacity. I also wish to reminisce and place on record our appreciation for the contribution made by past CEOs, members of the council and the progressive membership that has shaped the EFC into a strong sustainable and resilient employers' organization. Thank you very much.

My name is Sukkur Mahmud, Jatiyo Sramik League, largest national centre in Bangladesh. Mr Chair, thank you for giving the floor. On behalf of the Labour Movement of Bangladesh, I would like to explain my gratitude to all the representatives of Governments, the employers and the workers of the different countries attending the conference. We all have gathered here with a view to discuss and to take decisions on the issues relating to the decent work, social justice for a fair globalization, Sustainable Development Goals, social dialogue and tripartism and harassment against women and men in the world of work. Mr Chair, today, right at this moment I would like to memorize our great leader, father of the nation, Bangabondhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, under whose charismatic leadership Bangladesh became a member of the ILO in 1972, just after our liberation in 1971, ratified 29 ILO Conventions in the same day. As of today, Bangladesh has rectified 35 Conventions, including seven of the eight fundamental Conventions. Bangladesh is an active partner of ILO's Decent Work Programme. For a long period, Bangladesh

Trade Union Movement is struggling to ensure decent work for all. In order to achieve this, our demand includes further amendment of Bangladesh Labour Act, declaring national minimum wage, safeguarding the workplace victims and increasing compensation for the workers. The world community, including ILO, have been extending all solidarity support to the trade union movement in Bangladesh. For the last two years, Bangladesh Trade Union together with other partners, have been engaged in social dialogue to ensure the amendment of the Labour Act, especially to make trade union registration process simple and easier. Mr Chair, Bangladesh trade union movement is playing a vital role in promoting the principles of international labour standards and Decent Work Agenda in Bangladesh through better enforcement of the Bangladesh Labour Act. The trade union movement in Bangladesh jointly ... Trade Union rights in the labour laws of Bangladesh as per ILO Convention 87 and 98. Since that trade rights is the heart to ensure labour rights and labour welfare, we are continuously pressurizing the Government to ensure trade union rights in the EPZs and in formal sectors for workers. We also demand for increasing the amount of the compensation for all workers in Bangladesh. Mr Chair, I'd like to mention our labour friendly Prime Minister, Sheikh Hasina, under whose directives we have been able to ensure in workers' rights in Bangladesh, especially in upgrading labour-related laws and policies, upgrade the Department of Inspection and Department Labour with additional manpower, adequate budget and logistics. Under her leadership, the Government has taken some positive decision to simplify trade union registration. As part of the Tripartite Consultative Council, we are working closely with the Government to consider our other demands in the labour laws amendment. We feel there should be a comprehensive programme for injury scheme in Bangladesh. We strongly recommended the Government to step forward for introducing Employment Injury Scheme for the workers, for which the Government is working now. We request the ILO to come forward to support Bangladesh to implement the Occupational Safety and Health Policy and the Domestic Workers Protection and Welfare Policy adopted by the Government. Mr Chair, there is a provision in the Bangladesh Labour Act in Section 176(e) that at least 10 per cent of female members shall be included in the executive committee to the union and the establishment having 20 per cent of the total workers is female. Any incident or uncalled-for behaviour to the female workers in Bangladesh get protection from by the provision under the Section 332 of Bangladesh Labour Act 2006. However, we ask the ILO and the Government carry out intensive training programme and awareness raising the female worker. On behalf of Bangladesh trade union movement, we strongly urge an adoption of an instrument of violence and harassment against women and men in the world of work. Mr Chair, achieving Sustainable Development Goals, especially Goal 8 on decent work, is the highest priority issue for us in Bangladesh. We accept the Government ... [vgr INTERRUPTION 5:58] ... should ensure full engagement of the trade unions in implementing the national action of SDG in Bangladesh. We believe that the support from ILO and development partners skilled development programme for the workers contribute in making inclusive growth in Bangladesh. We hope this conference will bring a positive change in the lives of the workers. [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:27] Thank you all, united workers of the world. Mr Sukkur Mahmud, representative of the national largest centre in Bangladesh, thank you very much.

Worker (Uzbekistan)

President, ladies and gentlemen, Uzbekistan has created all of the conditions to improve the status of women, to empower women and to intensify their participation in all transformations within our society. The rights of women are guaranteed in the Constitution, the Civil, Family and Labour codes of the Republic of Uzbekistan. The country has created a unique system for social protection for motherhood and childhood. Therefore, the Labour Code has a section entitled Additional Guarantees for Women and Persons Performing Family Commitments. In addition to the Convention of the United Nations on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women, Uzbekistan has ratified also the ILO Conventions on equal remuneration for men and women for work, and also a Convention on discrimination, unemployment and occupation. The main rights of women are set forth in the Constitution of our country and our laws and is stemmed from international labour standards. Our labour legislation and the measures implemented to guarantee the rights of women to decent working conditions is fully in line with international standards, and on many issues they even surpass them. In particular, special benefits have been established to guarantee the employment of women, conditions have been created for decent work, additional parental leave is provided to parents, and various additional pay outs are provided for maternity. Currently, the social economic interests and labour rights of women is one of the priority areas of the work of the Federation of Trade Unions of Uzbekistan. Our federation brings together over 6 million members. Forty-eight per cent of our members are women. To increase the quality and effectiveness of the work of the trade union organizations to guarantee the social production of women, the Federation of Trade Unions of Uzbekistan has a Women's Council, and the sectorial and territorial trade union organizations also have commissions on work with women. The main area of their work is further strengthening the protection of the socio-economic interests and labour rights of women who work in businesses, organizations and establishments, regardless of their form of ownership. This work also entails creating decent and safe conditions for labour, and it also entails carrying out public oversights with regard to the implementation of these tasks. Now one of the most important documents in protecting the socio-economic rights and interests of workers, including women, is the General Agreement concluded between the Government of the Republic of Uzbekistan, the Council of Federation of Trade Unions, and the Chamber of Commerce and Industry on socio-economic issues. Accordingly, the country has over 100 sectorial and 14 territorial agreements, and within enterprises we have over 171,000 collective agreements. All of these collective agreements have a special section entitled Regulating the Work of Women. There are additional benefits and pay outs for women and persons performing family duties where we guarantee strength and social protection measures, equal opportunities for working men and women, and where we guarantee the observance of the principle of non-discrimination and equal pay for work of equal value. Therefore, the interests of women are guaranteed in our social partnership between the Government, the trade unions and the employers. On the whole, thanks to all of these transformations and changes, collective agreements have become a guarantee for women, allowing them to maintain their job with a stable wage, with safe working conditions and with rest periods. In addition to all of this, women in Uzbekistan today enjoy a number of benefits which allow them to combine their professional development with child rearing, and they also enjoy moral and financial support. In particular, through collective agreements, we ensure that pregnant women can have paid leave for medical check-ups and paid leaves are extended during pregnancy and labour. In addition to all of this, monthly pay outs are given to persons on paternal leave up until the age of two or three for the child. In businesses and organizations and establishments we are creating washing facilities, and special breaks are given to women so they can breastfeed their children up until the age of two. To guarantee true genuine equality, and this is something that trade unions will have to work on, together with trade unions, we feel it is useful and wise to continue our work to improve the legal basis by ratifying the Conventions of the International Labour Organization concerning work and social protection of women, and also, on the implementation of the relevant measures of Decent Work. Thank you very much.

Worker (Paraguay)

Madam President, first of all I would like to congratulate you upon your election, and I would like to wish you all the very best of success with the work that you need to carry out. I am here as a Workers' delegate from the Republic of Paraguay, and as such, I would like to congratulate the Director-General and the Office for the topics which are being raised at this conference, especially the topic of violence and harassment against men and women in the world of work. We know that this occurs across the world. Our country is no exception to this situation. There are situations where workers' human rights and labour rights are violated, especially those of women. Often, they continually suffer violence and harassment which affects them directly. The ramifications of this can be seen throughout the economy and society. There are cases of people leaving work, absenteeism, or simply abandoning their jobs because of the psychological and physical damage suffered by the victims. Women are often invisible in the world of work and stopped from forming unions, such as domestic workers. Rural work and informal work is something which needs special attention. In the Republic of Paraguay, many women are the head of the household. Therefore, they are more vulnerable, finding themselves in situations of harassment by their employers, simply because losing their job would stop them being able to bring home the bread to their families. There are serious challenges to overcome. It's very difficult to show that harassment, either physical violence or psychological harassment, has taken place. Furthermore, there is often shame experienced by the domestic worker, and some women find it very difficult to go through a workplace hearing. Often those who complain against their employers are simply dismissed. This is why we would like to congratulate ILO on bringing up this topic. It creates a framework which will allow us, social actors, to give adequate protection to the women and men in their respective jobs. I would also like to mention the work of ILO preparing for its centenary that will take place next year. The Workers' delegation of Paraguay continues to count upon the support of the ILO within the framework of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, with an eye to reducing poverty and creating decent work for all. The unions are taking part in a discussion around the tables of social dialogue, and we are bringing proposals to that table to improve the lives of our comrades. Recently, we started to create professional training programmes which are important in our caucuses and in each sector. We understand that the fight against poverty is everyone's task, and we call upon the Government to redouble their efforts to eradicate it. Second of all, I would like to mention some issues which are challenges that lie ahead of us and our tasks for the workers, social defence, especially, in the right to organise. Currently, whilst there are a number of unions registered in my country, the registration system is doubtful, and we have serious concerns about it. The amount of bureaucracy sometimes seems to be used to hinder the process, and union leaders are often dismissed because of their union links by some business in my country. We call for the respect of labour rights and the fundamental rights and principles contained in the Constitution of the ILO. This is why it is important that the dealing and the registration of unions takes place with guarantees, fosters union stability and ensures that the workers can defend their interests. Thank you very much.

Employer (Belgium)

Distinguished colleagues, I would like to thank the Director-General for his report on The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality. It is very comprehensive, and it provokes great discussion on the topic of gender equality. I will reflect upon some of the issues, and I am going to add some extra food for thought. Overall, the report paints a rather negative picture about women in the world of work and emphasises the prevalence of unfairness at work and within social structures. Equality and fairness, the words are out. Equality is the state of being equal, especially in status, rights or opportunities. Equality has fairness embedded in it, but what is equal is not always fair, and what is fair is not always equal. Aristotle said, "The worst form of inequality is to try to make unequal things equal." Let that be a first lesson. It is fairness that prevails. My message here is, you have to be willing to dig deep. Don't be superficial. Go beyond the equal slogans. Look at the actual practices, intended and non-intended. Men are from Earth, women are from Earth; deal with it. There is no doubt that a lot still needs to be done to deal with double standards in dealing with men and women in the workplace, as well as general societal hypocritical attitudes and stereotyping, but we must guard against the generic negative painting of the situation. A lot of good initiatives have been taken, a lot of good practices exist. A majority, stemming from employers and employers' organizations. I will not further cite examples, as colleagues already did before me. There are many ways to address this challenge, but one thing I am sure of is that a mere legalistic, institutional or calculative approach is not an effective and efficient way forward. Shifting responsibilities to employers, institutions or even individuals is counterproductive. As the report says, "We are all responsible together." As I said, we have to be willing to dig deep. We have to assess the way we work. An integrated approach is needed. Recruitment, working conditions, work relations, competency development, talent and career management, the way we communicate our leadership, trust and respect, all of that needs to be assessed from a fairness and gender perspective. We also should provide individuals with self-assessment tools. A lot of what we do is non-intended unfairness or substandard use of capacities. Self-reflection is a critical component for creating awareness amongst people of his or her implicit unconscious bias. The topic of this report of Guy Ryder, links with other topics of this conference, and probably the most important one is the future of work. Although 'working in the future' is the more appropriate terminology. There is one important key element to make sure we will benefit from the opportunities that the future will bring, opportunities to create more and decent jobs. That element is to go for what I call all potentials. That means an approach that seeks at getting the best out of each and every single person in the world of work. This is about talent. This is not about more women in science, technology, engineering and mathematics or men in nursing. There is nothing wrong with women making a choice for a so-called female occupation, provided that that choice was a real choice based on talent, not the choice under pressure from culture, family or religion or out of economic necessity. A talent and capacity approach is also the best way to get women in the corporate world. But first thing's first, if deploying your talent does not result in sufficient income and or a decent job, you are stuck, and your choice is not a fair one. That is why we have to keep investing in the basics; Social Protection Floors, governance capacity, fight corruption, fair justice, etc. In this working in the future there is no space for violence and harassment against women or anybody else. Our concern should be how to bring that to practice. We don't need high-flying statements, hashtags, declarations and conventions if they don't result in effective prevention and protection. True equal treatment means holding everyone accountable in the same way, regardless of race, gender, religion, ethnicity or political ideology. Equality of treatment opportunities is a founding value of the ILO, and this concerns us all. Action not words. Thank you.

Mr Visentini

European Trade Union Confederation

Distinguished Chair, delegates, working people are facing many challenges these days, and we are convinced that we can only make progress if we work together. The European trade union movement is working to promote ILO and UN goals to fight inequality and gender discrimination, to combat poverty, to protect our planet and ensure a better life for working people. We believe that Europe has a duty to show the way implementing the SDGs in the framework of the UN's Sustainable Development Agenda. Within this global agenda we have identified three key priorities: decent work and social progress including fairer wages for working people; just transition in the framework of climate change and environmental sustainability, digitalization, automation and globalization; democracy, justice and participative societies, including social dialogue and promotion of collective bargaining. We are calling on the European Union and its Member States, as are the ILO, to prepare national plans for implementing the SDGs, involving trade unions at every step through social dialogue. The European Union must place Social Europe at the top of its agenda. To that end, we have helped to shape the new European Union initiative called the European Pillar of Social Rights. We believe these social rights must be enshrined in legislation to make a tangible difference to peoples' lives. We want more security for workers. The European Union has proposed a directive on transparent and predictable working conditions. We believe this is a great opportunity for making social rights binding. These directives must tackle precarious jobs and protect all categories of workers, including self-employed and platform workers. These workers should have full disclosure of wages and conditions before they start, plus decent pay and guaranteed hours. No more zero-hour type contracts in the world. We want high levels of good social protection. The European Union promises to extend protection for non-standard workers. However, we believe the guarantees in the package proposed don't go far enough. Precarious work and poverty wages mean many workers can no longer make ends meet. Tackling non-standard and precarious work means also addressing the challenges of just transition and the Future of Work. We must make sure that no one is left behind and that all categories of workers can benefit from the same rights and protection. That is why the European Trade Union Confederation has been campaigning for higher pay across Europe and the rest of the world. While productivity goes up and economists insist the recovery is underway, workers have failed to get their fair share of profits. A pay rise would actually help to sustain recovery by boosting internal demand. Our pay rise campaign has highlighted the unfair salary differences in different European countries, east and west, north and south, which lead to social dumping. And we must also target the gender and youth pay gaps. Collective bargaining between the social partners is the best way to secure better pay. Political leaders have recognised that social dialogue is crucial to a strong economy but have done very little to facilitate social dialogue and collective bargaining. We urge all politicians, all public authorities, to do more to build social dialogue. Collective bargaining and social dialogue must be at the core of the ILO initiative on the Future of Work as they are essential for the implementation of the UN 2030 Agenda, of the Global Deal launched by the Swedish Prime Minister, and of the European Pillar of Social Rights. Dear delegates, this is our commitment to work with social partners and governments to secure a fairer, more inclusive Europe. A Europe that earns the support of its people by showing that it really can give them a better life. A Europe that can contribute also to strengthen social justice in the rest of the world. Thank you very much.

Mr Shcherbakov

General Confederation of Trade Unions

Madam President, distinguished delegates, at the outset I should like to express my gratitude to the Director-General for his interesting and rich report where he invites us to discuss the ILO centenary initiative on gender equality. The issue of achieving gender equality is of key importance when it comes to the fight for social justice for the creation of favourable conditions for the implementation of the Decent Work for all agenda. We support the conclusions and proposals in the report. Guaranteeing gender equality in the world of work is one of the core tasks of the General Confederation of Trade Unions and its member organizations. I shall say from the outset that at a political level in our countries there are no clear factors or criteria for gender inequality. There is no shortage of instruments guaranteeing a legal basis for gender equality. On this account, we do have enough laws and by-laws and various other important state documents. Equal rights for men and women in political and economic life are guaranteed in our national constitutions, and in addition to this, we also have the relevant conventions of the ILO and the UN. The problem, however, is that between the laws and their strict implementation there is still a major gap, i.e. an implementation gap. Political decisions that are important for gender equality have proved insufficient to once and for all end cultural stereotypes and to overcome deep-rooted convictions. In other words, whilst there is formal equality, true, full gender equality has not yet been achieved. Discrimination on the basis of gender, directly or indirectly, is something that we are seeing increasingly frequently in the world of work and in labour relations, first and foremost on issues such as the difference in the levels and nature of employment between men and women and the informal sector, gender features within unemployment patterns. There is differentiation in the fields of work in which men and women are engaged, and there is also competition on the labour market, wage and income gap defining the economic contribution of men and women to family budgets. There are also differences when it comes to career advancements and opportunities and climbing the career ladder. There is an under-representation of women in high managerial positions in the economy, and indeed within trade unions, whereby I should like to point out that among the leaders at the lower trade union level women tend to dominate. According to surveys, one in three women in our region is facing prejudice from employers when it comes to gaining access to employment, and they are also facing harassment at work. Women make up over one half of our workforce, but their number in high-tech and high-paid sectors is not in line with this indicator. The majority of them tend to be in low-paid jobs and professions. With all the economic difficulties, with the winding down of manufacturing and with austerity measures, women are the ones who are the main victims of downsizing. Trade unions in our region are convinced that on the labour market women will lose to men as long as they continue to bear the burden of the task of combining waged work with family commitments, and family commitments are something that falls to women mainly. As a result of this, women are victims on the labour market. All of this leads to an under-appreciation of the contribution of women on the labour market. According to data we have in the region, women earn less money than men. In Belarus, Kyrgyzstan and Russia, they earn 23 per cent less, Armenia 34 per cent less, Tajikistan 40 per cent less, and Azerbaijan 55 per cent less. We are convinced that the best way to end this situation is to look for ways to generally improve the state of working people, including by taking a first step of increasing a minimum wage. At our initiative, there has been a campaign called 'A minimum wage no lower than the living wage.' The first country to achieve this minimum wage was Belarus, followed by Russia in May of this year. A key role in addressing this issue should be played by the ratification and respect for ILO Conventions on gender equality, and above all, the core Conventions in this sphere, namely C100, C111, C156 and C1A3. Whilst the provision of the first three Conventions have been broadly ratified, the ratification of the latter two does not fill us with hope. Only four countries of the region have ratified them. Today, in our region, reform is underway with regard to the social protection system, and we see our role in reflecting the gender factor in this process, so that through collective bargaining agreements, through other ways available to us, we are able to achieve conditions that are vital to ensure that men and women enjoy equality in the world of work. Thank you.

International Transport Workers' Federation

Good afternoon Chair, distinguished delegates, thank you for this opportunity to address you today. My name is Stephen Cotton, and I'm here to represent the 20 million men and women transport workers of the ITF. At this year's ILC, the ITF has brought more affiliates than ever before. It is our sign of commitment to the ILO, our belief in the principles and values of this distinguished house, and our support for a better future. These are not empty statements. We are quite clear that when we work together collaboratively, we can achieve real results. We want to acknowledge the cooperation brought about by the ILO in respect of Qatar, and our thanks to the Labour Ministry and our partners there to improve the situation. Again, we would like to thank sector for the support in delivering an improved Maritime Labour Convention. We are participating in the technical committees, affirming our belief in tripartism, multilateralism and the rules-based system. The ILO's Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association do fantastic work to support the underprivileged transport workers and workers of the world. It is a vital strand to fight for people's rights in a globalized world. But this year there are a number of critical issues impacting on the peoples of the world and our society. Violence and harassment plagues the transport industry, in particular gender-based violence. It's unacceptable, and it must stop. We need a Convention and a Recommendation from this house. The Standard Setting Committee has to lead and play a part in this future. The value of the ILO Convention cannot be understated. It will provide protection.

It will give workers a voice. It will give a legal grounding of support to workers, in particular women. In the fight for dignity, human rights, decent work, security and freedom in the world of work, gender equality must be realised in all jobs, in all workplaces, in every country. In leadership, in participation, in paying conditions, in the future of work, every possible measure must be made. A message must go out to the world, and the ILO must be clear and steadfast, no more violence and harassment in the world of work. When we look globally, the ILO needs to be vigilant. In Panama we have been fighting against attacks by the Panama Canal Authority on the safety of vessels transiting the canal. Now the situation is reaching breaking-point. Our captains are being asked to work over 200 hundred hours bi-weekly, and the conditions are not acceptable, and we must respond. Again, in Iran we are fighting for basic union freedoms against imprisonment and oppression. So we welcome our colleagues from Iran. In Colombia, pilots representing our affiliate have seen their basic rights undermined by the national carrier, giving better conditions to non-unionised pilots. Last year's lawful industrial action saw strike-breaking pilots brought in and resulted in disciplinaries, suspensions and dismissals. We call on the Governments of those countries to respond to these labour disputes and do everything in their power to resolve them. As we look forward, the future of work, in particular in relationship to the automation and next year's centenary, the gig economy, informality and gender equality, it's vital that we respond to these issues. We have our congress in Singapore next year, and the women of the ITF and the young people will be leading our congress to create new opportunities to respond to the new working challenges. Part of that process will be setting out an agenda for the future, and as we reenergize our international and regional policy programmes, we are committed to working with the ILO to deliver those over the coming years. In conclusion, we want to acknowledge the tremendous work of Guy Ryder and his Secretariat, and we recognize that, in these difficult times, their leadership is absolutely crucial. And we also want to acknowledge the role of Sharan Burrows as the leader of the ITUC who has been fighting and struggling to make this world a better place and fight for social justice for the men and women of the union movement and society as a whole. So dear brothers and sisters, thank you for the opportunity. Let's look forward to work together and build a much brighter future. Thank you very much.

Worker (Spain)

Dear President, ladies and gentlemen, the Director-General's report shows clearly and cruelly the paradox of a world where there is an extraordinary productive capacity together with an increasing inequality, poverty and social exclusion. The ILO must contribute to helping states and workers' and employers' representatives to rise to the challenges by leading a global economy on a path to sustainable development and growth which is fair. The reality to work is that it is constantly changing, and we must find different answers to new challenges. There is an increased process of globalization and increase of integration of areas of the economy in global value chains. We must ensure that social protection, the right to work and social dialogue are implemented. We agree that the ILO should reconcile the impulse to the initiative for the Future of Work and should lead the global debate on priority policies with the SDGs to reduce inequalities and end poverty. These objectives coincide with the trade union priorities. In Spain, we have seen a change in government following a range of reforms that have been based on internal devaluation. We have a slogan, 'There is growth without distribution', and we must reverse this challenge. Spain in 2017 increased its levels of production compared to the crisis of 2008. Nonetheless, we have only seen a 43 per cent increase of the working hours that were lost between 2007 and 2013. We have a perverse growth in terms of productivity. In 2017, there was recovery of benefits and dividends in companies. Nonetheless, there was wage devaluation. We need to ensure that there is greater job creation and an increase in salaries. This is something that has been said not only by trade union organizations, by the Commission, as well as the IMF and the European Central Bank. There are structural reforms that are making it difficult for us to increase wages. We need also to ensure that we reduce precariousness. We currently see 27 per cent of precarious employment in Spain, which is not reflected anywhere else in the Europe. We must not look at lifelong learning as the response to technological innovation when we see the number of temporary contracts, which are an average 55 days long and represent 90 per cent of all contracts. Labour regulation in Spain is an incentive, and we see that there is unfair competition between companies. In this context of inequality, we have also seen a clear gender bias. Women in Spain need to have a 28 per cent increase in their salaries to be on par with men. Though the difference between salaries between men and women explains the wage gap in Spain, new public policies require a new fiscal framework. The Programme for Stability for 2018-2021 would be based on reducing public spending in the Spanish economy of around 38.6 per cent. The trade unions in the county have taken into consideration this new reality, and we wish that the Government broaden its general budget as well as focusing on other fiscal policies. We need to ensure that economic stability and the redistribution and inclusive growth are compatible. We also need to ensure that there are changes in labour regulation and a collective negotiation to promote fair salary distribution. Spain would like to go back to the legitimacy of social dialogue and connective bargaining so that we can actually implement the changes which we believe are strategic. We need to anticipate how digital changes and technological changes will impact society. We also need to ensure that we value professional experience. These are elements that need to have a greater involvement of the social partners so that we do not have the conflict between tripartite agreements, bargaining space and labour relations and economic relations. We cannot have social cohesion and democracy in this kind of economic relationship. Thank you very much for your attention.

Government (Cuba)

Mr Chairman, Ministers and delegates, the ILO's commitment to social justice and to ensuring that the fundamental principles and rights in the world of work are respected is fully buttressed by the agenda and the documents that will be looked at during this meeting. We can agree with what was said by the Director-General in his report on the need to, and the opportunity for, giving a fresh impulse to gender equality at the workplace, bearing in mind the widely acknowledged and well-documented fact that in order to achieve such a noble goal, we still have a long way to go. In Cuba, since the Revolution triumphed, achieving gender equality has been a Government priority. A priority that is underpinned by the Constitution itself, and which is expressed through many legal provisions aimed at protecting women's rights, in particular in the field of healthcare, education, access to employment, equal wages, social security, and technical and cultural development. More than 50 years on from the Revolution, Cuban women now play a key role in our country's political, economic and social life, as can be seen if you look at the participation figures. Women represent 53.2 per cent of the members of the National Assembly of People's Power. They also represent 48.4 per cent of the members of the State Council. Three out of five of its vice-chairs and 35 per cent of ministers are women. Women also represent 48 per cent of civil servants, and within those 48 per cent they represent 78.5 per cent of public healthcare workers, 48 per cent of scientific researchers and generally speaking, they represent 66.8 per cent of the most highly qualified technical and professional workforce in our country. However, we continue to work on changing cultural habits so that family duties are shared between men and women more fairly. We are also working towards broadening and enhancing the institutional services for providing childcare and care for elderly citizens, as well as for protecting maternity rights and other measures all aimed at protecting and facilitating women's participation in our society. Our country has continued to improve its social and economic development with a view to building a sovereign, independent, socialist, democratic, prosperous and sustainable nation, and in order to improve evermore the quality of life, well-being and social justice within our country, despite the fact that the economic, financial and trade embargo against Cuba remains in place, and has considerable economic impacts which limit our development. Mr President, we consider that the ILO can continue to contribute to the fight for gender equality at work and within society by promoting projects that will foster the integration of the world of work with the multiple facets of sustainable development for all. For this we should build on positive experiences but also seek new and innovative approaches, as is mentioned in the report. We support this noble goal and would like to make our humble experiences available to you all. Thank you.

Mr Acosta Javier

Employer (Dominican Republic)

Good morning to you all. The delegation of employers of the Dominican Republic is honoured to be here with representatives from across the world. We welcome the Director-General's report, Guy Ryder, and reaffirm the importance of the ILO in the United Nations system, given its specificity as being the only entity whose mandate focuses on industrial relations and where tripartism aims to achieve fair social agreements and which allows us to achieve sustainable development in an ever-changing world. COPARDOM acknowledges the contributions made by the IOE which refers to the role of companies in society, and we also expect the International Labour Organization to be effective, agile and to provide opportunities in its proposals, regulations and contributions. From our understanding, the greatest contribution of the ILO must ferment social dialogue as mechanisms to achieve tripartite consensus in the policies and provisions which aim to create more and better jobs and sustainable companies. The actions carried out by the ILO in this field will have repercussions on the achievement of the objectives that we have all set ourselves, such as is established in this International Labour Conference. The consolidation of social dialogue will facilitate effective cooperation, and this will drive us to achieve the Sustainable Development Goals. We have launched a push for poverty reduction. We are promoting actions to ensure corporate social responsibility, and we will contribute to change the profile of the population through quality education and vocational training for work. We aspire to the consensus, which we have referred to, as well as to generate solutions to the distortions which we see in the labour market in the Dominican Republic. We are strengthening labour legislation and international labour law, and with this we have also established the tripartite board for conflict resolution. We hope that this will serve as a fair tool to assess the right that our businesses have as well as those who work with us. For years now, our country has had harmonious labour relations with the Government and with workers, and we believe that this strength, together with the dialogue mechanisms that are appropriate, will facilitate the improvement at an institutional level so that we can provide answers to the current distortions that we see in the labour market of our country. In order for this to be achieved, we would like to sign an agreement for jobs where we have sustainable companies to create decent jobs, to ferment social protection at a universal level and to reach levels of competitiveness which drive investment and provide equal opportunities for all our workers. As we have said time and time again, we reiterate our commitment to ensure that we have this agreement through dialogue and through agreement. Lasting peace can only exist when there is well-being and justice, and this well-being is inextricably linked to public policies and private policies which ferment transparency and the creation of decent work and sustainable businesses, as well as businesses that are environmentally responsible. We reaffirm our commitment to tripartite consensus so that we can generate wealth and stability in all our nations. Thank you.

Ms Kagonye

Government (Zimbabwe)

A very good morning to you all. The Chairperson, on behalf of the Government of Zimbabwe and the entire Zimbabwe tripartite delegation, on this 107th Session of the International Labour Conference, I wish to begin my address by congratulating you Honourable Samir Murad, together with the Vice-Chairs, on your election to preside over this session of the conference. Your appointment meets with our high expectations for the outcomes of this important session, which comes on the eve of our centenary celebrations, and most importantly, as we seek to understand and chaperone the future regarding the world of work. It is with this in mind that my delegation welcomes the Director-General's report, The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality. The report before us aptly captures the situation of women at work and profiles some insightful ideas towards embracing the opportunities, the challenges and the threats that define the context in which the impetus for equality must succeed. Indeed, your report, Director-General, presents a painful and hard truth that attainment of equality in the world of work remains a pipe dream, despite the existence of policy and legislation at national level as well as international instruments that are primed to guide efforts in mitigating the plight of women in the world of work. At this defining moment, when the ILO celebrates 100 years in existence, our resolve in tackling the challenges to equality outlined in your report should be unwavering. Chairperson, my delegation appreciates the dilemma of the new opportunities to breaking the barriers to inequality brought about by the digital economy and technological innovation, which unfortunately, as your report suggests, are not immune to gender inequalities. It is imperative, therefore, for the Future of Work initiative to tackle the issue of mitigating the traps of inequality abound in the evolving Fourth Industrial Revolution. I find essential to reiterate the Director-General's call for a new push for equality as we embrace the future and steer the ILO and its constituents to upscale efforts towards equality. Our focus on fixing the workplace without seeking to influence society has proved to be futile given the changing dynamics of the world of work ushered by the evolving Fourth Industrial Revolution, characterized by cyber physical systems. We therefore urge the ILO to innovatively confront head on, the value systems of our society regarding gender relations that constitute the greatest structural obstacles, weighing down our efforts in attaining equality in the world of work. On our part in Zimbabwe, Section 17 of the Constitution provides for a strong legal foundation for gender, equity and women advancement. We are currently seized with amending the labour legislation to, among other objectives, give full effect to the principle of equal pay for work of equal value, as well as broadening the scope of equality with a view to aligning it to the provisions of Section 17 of our Constitution. It is our hope that sector-specific collective bargaining agreements could accordingly be amended to give full effect to principles of equality in the workplace. We have also revised our education curriculum to ensure that it includes mainstreaming of gender issues. In that regard, gender issues are now taught from early childhood up to secondary education level. The idea is to instil values on gender that would transform future societal values that guarantee equality beyond the workplace. The National Gender Policy was revised in 2017 to give impetus to efforts for gender equality, taking into consideration deficiencies highlighted in the last Zimbabwe Demographic Health Survey and CEDAW reports. Through the revised National Gender Policy, a monitoring and evaluation framework dealing specifically with gender equality and women empowerment is being finalized to enable the national agenda machinery to monitor and assess implementation of national, regional and international commitments on gender equality and women empowerment. Chairperson, the new dispensation in Zimbabwe seeks to prioritize economic recovery through a battery of initiatives anchored on re-engagement with the international community and the restoration of international values that will create more opportunities for our people and decent work for women in particular. Your proposal in pushing for equality, encapsulated in the mantra 'beyond business as usual', is in sync with the calls for the new establishment in Zimbabwe. We agree with your recommendations that raising the voices and representation of women and ending violence and harassment are crucial in forging a push towards equality. Accordingly, the new Government has put in place measures to guarantee a conducive environment necessary for equality and increased representation of women. Chairperson, the time has certainly come that the ILO imprints a solid front towards equality, recognising that the world of work is situated in changing context, characterized by unprecedented political, social and economic uncertainties. I thank you.

Worker (Argentina)

Chairman, distinguished delegates, we workers are seeing fast and far-reaching changes affecting our world. One of these changes is that of globalization. Globalization in which there is a total and unfettered free flow of capital. Capital is always used with a view to achieving the highest level of short-term profitability without taking into account the price paid by society. The consequences and the effects of this are ever more relevant. For instance, there is skyrocketing inequality between different regions of the world but also within each individual country. According to a recent international report, 82 per cent of the wealth generated has benefited the richest 1 per cent of the global population only. So we are also seeing States that are coming under pressure to dismantle their social security systems, thereby paralyzing the redistribution of wealth and having a destabilizing effect on society. Armed conflicts and situations of extreme violence are devastating entire regions in the world. These phenomena are generating migratory flows that represent a serious issue for the future of our peoples. To all this, you have to add the existence of authoritarian powers that care very little for public freedoms and fundamental rights. The ILO's mandate to further promote social justice is not just an abstract notion or an empty concept with which we can embellish our statements or speeches. No, it is a very concrete principle that implies a fair distribution of wealth, labour conditions that respect human dignity and a healthy work-life balance. A growing informal sector, more and more precarious jobs, and a lack of decent in global supply chains are a warning sign that we cannot ignore. They reflect the increase in inequality and the failure of globalization to provide a solution for greater social well-being. The situation of women in the world goes well beyond the realm of work. It includes the social, political and cultural fields as well. It's a question that relates to human dignity. What we have before us is a crosscutting form of injustice, and we must all tackle it together: employers, workers and governments. It is a situation of persistent inequality. The Americas are also living a period of uncertainty in all areas. This is exacerbated by what CEPAL calls the culture of privilege, which is characterized by the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few, disparities in terms of equal opportunities, and by the fact that inequality is becoming commonplace and that there are hegemonic powers, amongst other things. I believe that we must transform this culture of privilege into to a culture of work that will foster social justice in order to make sure that nobody is left behind, as is expressed by Agenda 2030. That is the path towards truly achieving the Sustainable Development Goals. These goals are the bridge between the past and future of labour relations within the framework of a fair transition. Agenda 2030 is not just a government-level commitment. We are all entitled to, and have a duty to, become involved and to build and monitor the implementation of these goals. We need to achieve an institutionalized social dialogue in order to promote a culture of compromise, as Pope Francis pointed out. We trade unions are working towards that end. We need to generate sustainable economies along with social protection, safe jobs and decent wages. In Argentina, we are experiencing great levels of anxiety and grief. The macroeconomic crisis is deepening the fault lines and feeding into a lack of hope. We don't want this to happen. It should not be happening. Once more we are in the claws of the international monetary fund. Markets react, rural areas react, and we workers will also react by defending productive development, national industry and a culture of work. Or does somebody expect that the costs of the mistakes made by, but not imposed upon, the economic governance of our country and the adjustments imposed upon us by the IMF will be paid just by workers? No, we the workers are the victims of inflation, of the falling currency reserves and economic paralysis, but what about the other sectors? The only path forward is that of social dialogue in which we all virtuously strive to overcome these difficult times and to transform them into a solution for sustainable development. Thank you very much.

Government (Nepal)

Mr President, Excellencies, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen. At the outset let me congratulate you, Mr President, on your election to this important position. Let me also appreciate the Director-General for this comprehensive report on the Women at Work Initiative, which not only sums up the structural and other constraints, but also provides pragmatic suggestions for the attainment of gender equality and justice in the world of work. Let me say to this august gathering that historic achievements have been made in Nepal over the last one year, in the socio-economic and political spheres. The labour sector has also made a remarkable progress. We have successfully completed the election to the three tiers of government, federal, provincial and local, under the new Constitution. It has kindled hope among people for stability and development. It is also important to mention that the local election came up with 41 per cent women elected in representatives. On the labour front, after the constructive engagement of all stakeholders, we enact a new Labour Act 2017 in line with the ILO fundamental principles and right at work. The regulations required for effective enforcement of the act have also been adapted. The most important effort of the new act is that all workers are covered within jurisdiction. Enactment of a contribution-based social security law is another important milestone in this direction. Within a couple years, this system would be implemented in a full-fledged manner by engaging the informal sector also. In addition to this, we have prepared a master plan to eliminate all form of child labour by 2025. We are also in the process of highlighting our national policy on occupational health and safety. Mr President, with these labour laws, policies and initiative at hand, we are committed to expanding decent and gainful opportunities and fair labour practices, enforcing labour audit in line with the spirit of new laws, eliminating child labour and strongly dealing with workplace violence and sexual harassment, and lastly, establishment and operationalization of a quasi-judicial mechanism to deal with labour dispute. Mr President, Nepal prefers to make foreign employment an option rather than compulsion. For this purpose, the flagship Prime Minister employment programme seeks to create massive decent work opportunities for the youth through skill enhancement and entrepreneurship development. It also ensures a minimum employment guarantee to the people of deprived areas and marginalized communities. Nepal looks forward to finalising subsequent adoption of the global compact of safe, orderly and regular migration. We have commenced decisive action to ensure fair recruitment and control of fraudulent activities. As the current Chair of Colombo Process, Nepal is effortful in making labour migration safe, predictable and well-managed for the benefit of all. Nepal respects and implements the principle of social dialogue and tripartism. The Central Labour Advisory Council is now in operation in our national forum for consultation and dialogue on labour issues. Mr President, before I close, let me take this opportunity to extend our thanks to the ILO and other development partners for their continued cooperation and support in promoting decent work, social dialogue, tripartism and rights at work. As the ILO approaches the centenary celebration, there is an imperative to promote and consolidate decent work opportunities for every individual worker in the world. Nepal would be happy to join this noble initiative. Thank you.

Government (Sweden)

Good morning. Chair, the issue of gender equality in the Report of the Director-General is both timely and relevant. I welcome the report and that the Director-General chooses to highlight the issue of gender equality in ILO's work in general, and through the Women at Work initiative in particular. But we cannot rest, the work is not done, we still have big challenges. Women are under-represented at the labour market. Women are under-represented in positions of power. Women earn less. Wage inequality is still a reality 67 years after the adoption of the Equal

---

Remuneration Convention. Chair, all people are of equal value and must be able to enjoy the same human rights, responsibilities and opportunities. Gender equality also makes economic sense. Sweden's Government wants to make sure that gender equality perspective is brought into policy-making on a broad front, nationally and internationally. In the development of the Swedish welfare state, gender equality has been a major factor. Affordable childcare, a more equal division of parental leave and individual taxation are essential reforms which have had an important impact on women's earnings and well-being and economic empowerment. Social partners are responsible for wage formation. Equal wage for equal work is an obvious area where the social partners have an important impact. Chair, I am pleased to see the response of the Director-General to the #MeToo campaign, and the reports on sexual harassment within the UN system. I want to be clear, men's harassment and violence against women is one of the ultimate expressions of inequality. Preventing and combatting violence and other abuse against women and girls is a top priority for Sweden and must continue to be high on the UN's agenda. I also want to comment concretely on the Report from the Director-General. The DG has proposed five areas of action. Let me start with suggesting a sixth area, namely to apply already agreed rights and extend the rights of work for women. We know that women's participation on the labour market is lower than men's. The reason for that varies and includes lack of childcare and old-fashioned views on the role of women in society and working life. However, in many parts of the world, women are excluded from many occupations, limiting their choice to freely choose their work. Women should have the right to pursue freely any job or profession. The report rightly points to the care economy as a contributing factor in the push for equality. The absence of care facilities and obligation falling on women to shoulder responsibility for unpaid care are widely recognized as crucial obstacles to the advancement of women at work. One important aspect is an even gender distribution of positions of power. Therefore, the proportion of women in leading positions in both business and public sector needs to increase. Chair, the ILO should lead by example. Gender equality must be mainstreamed into a staff policy as well as policies and actions. Sweden would want the ILO to place greater emphasis on increasing the share of women in higher positions. Chair, let me conclude, women at work is future of work. Thank you.

Worker (Japan)

Thank you, Chair. Distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, it is a great honour for me to address to the conference on behalf of Japanese workers. Chair, this year's discussion aiming at formulating new instruments on ending violence and harassment is significantly timely action. We, JTUC-RENGO, have firm hope that an effective Convention, supplemented by Recommendation, will be adopted next year, and it will contribute to realize safe and productive work places where human rights are respected. In Japan, discussion to consider to develop the legislation dealing with harassment issues is expected. We also call for effective domestic regulations. Laws and regulations are important, but it is not enough just formulating them. Improved initiatives and awareness raising are needed at each workplace. We have been campaigning our actions to promote active women's participation at various areas. This is because we believe that enhancement of movements involving large variety of people, regardless of their gender, age and employment type, will serve to solve many different issues effectively. According to our survey, trade unions which have more than one female executive tend to conduct advanced initiatives such as narrowing the wage gap between men and women, supporting balancing work and family life, and addressing harassment issues. We will continue to make our effort sincerely towards gender equal society. Then I need to touch on the issue of public employees' basic labour rights. The discussion of this issue is tabled in this year's Committee on the Application of Standards. The basic labour rights of public employees in Japan have been restricting since 1948. This is outstanding issue in the ILO. In the meantime, ILO Committee on Freedom of Association has been issuing ten times of Recommendation to urge Government of Japan to comply with the ILO convention. Nevertheless, the Government has not taken any concrete measures to rectify these situations. We cannot accept that such situation is still continuing. We urge the Government to take prompt and concrete actions in line with the discussion and conclusion of the CAS. Let me conclude by touching on the ILO centenary and our commitment. Discussions related to the Future of Work are conducting now actively in many parts of the world. However, the discussion on how changing world of work effects on workers and how trade unions will challenge is still underway and need to deepen its analysis. In my view at least, carrying through social dialogue and respecting tripartism at all level is the key to address the future of work. Next year JTUC-RENGO will celebrate 30 years of this foundation. JTUC-RENGO will take such opportunities like RENG0 and the ILO's historical milestones and the Tokyo 2020 Games as leverage to promote decent work in Japan and other regions as well. Thank you for your attention.

Government (Kenya)

The President of the 107th Session of the ILC, Kenya commends the DG for the detailed report that provides the commitment and achievement of the ILO and its constituents in the course of gender equality at work and in society. I am indeed encouraged that, in addition to this plenary debate, the negotiation of an international standard to guide the fight against violence and harassment at work is a major contribution to the broader push for equality. Kenya recognizes that women's contribution to national economies is apparent, yet women continue to be left behind. Globally, women have less chance of being in the labour force and are often at the bottom of the economic ladder. They are also increasingly concentrated in generally low-paying occupations in the services sector. Consequently, their earnings have contracted further, and they are also more likely to be subjected to violence and harassment at work. This is more reason that we must take a conscious decision to enhance the status of women. Women are angry, and now more and more are able to express that anger. Kenya's own internationally renowned celebrity, Lupita Nyong'o, has been at the centre of the harsh #MeToo campaign to protest against sexual harassment and rape. We recognize that we, too, must turn this anger into action, particularly at workplaces and in labour markets. This is a unique opportunity to expand this platform and continue a national conversation around sexual violence worldwide. We therefore need to collectively move beyond business as usual. In recent years, Kenya has had a number of major improvements to its legal and policy framework with regard to discrimination. A major start was in the review of Employment Act 2007, which outlawed discrimination. This was followed by the enactment of the 2010 Constitution that marked a beginning for women's rights in Kenya, seeking to remedy the traditional exclusion of women and promote their full involvement in every aspect of growth and development. In addition to this, the National Gender and Equality Commission was established and serves to contribute to the reduction of gender inequalities and discrimination. However, we do acknowledge that a number of problems still persist. This includes the inadequate implementation and enforcement of existing laws, low awareness of rights and obligations among rights holders and enforcement agencies, financial and other barriers preventing access to justice for victims of discrimination. As part of broader efforts to create decent and adequate jobs for all, and thus benefiting women as well, His Excellency the President, unveiled the Big Four Agenda which aims at achieving food security, affordable housing, increased manufacturing and provision of affordable healthcare to all. However, the implementation of this massive agenda must be underpinned by robust institutional framework cutting across all affected sectors. Towards this end, the Kenya Government has initiated legislative reforms in key social protection institutions, including National Social Security Fund and the National Hospital Insurance Fund, with a view to making effective and efficient delivery of social security programme to the vulnerable groups, including women. Let me however clarify that contrary to the views expressed by the social partners on the proposed legal frameworks, the Government is committed to consultations with our social partners and is open to receiving views on these proposals in line with participatory approach provided by the Constitution and the relevant employment and labour laws. In conclusion, we look forward to the ILO redoubling its effort to have women's views, perspective and interests taken up across the whole range of ILO activities, including those undertaken through technical cooperation. I thank you.

Mr Rivero

Government (Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela)

Thank you, President. Congratulations on your election and the wonderful way in which you are leading this conference, and we welcome the Director-General's report, the Women at Work Initiative. Venezuela has much to contribute to the different topics that are being currently debated in this body. We have made considerable progress in acknowledging the role of women in reducing the workload and doing this in dialogue with all the sectors. We have a revolutionary Government commitment to its people, and we have our conviction and our own experience which show that, in order to respond to the needs of people, we must be, humanist, we must show solidarity, and we must move away from individual interests. In our Republic, we have maintained working conditions, and we have pensions as from 55 years of age for women and 60 years of age for men, regardless of the contributions that they have made. Currently, we have 100 per cent of the adult population which has a pension. These pensions are the equivalent of the minimum wage and are constantly updated, which happens two or three times a year, in line with the minimum wage. This is being despite the economic sabotage, the financial blockade and the so-called sanctions by the North American imperialists and their partners. We say so-called sanctions because they are neither ethically legal, and they violate the United Nations Charter and no country can take measures, which are essentially aggressions, against a people which preaches peace. There is a long list of leading figures which have attacked our country and who are then repudiated by their own peoples and then thrown onto the dunghill of history. We, as a government, internationally speaking, act in full respect of the authorities of each country. We do not create problems with any government. Nonetheless, we regret the decisions taken by the North American and European Governments who state that they are the custodians of peace but who impose war and create domestic conflicts and dismember countries. In these situations where we had an attack on the labour market, we must repeat that the challenges which we face in the labour market are associated to the core problems of humanity. Capitalism cannot resolve any of these issues to the benefit of its peoples. Direct bellicose aggressions or IMF measures or remote controlled bombardments against a civilian population are a demonstration of the huge number of resources which these parties have in order to maintain their system, which can no longer create any well-being in strategic terms. Nobody can come out of this process because of the coercion and direct aggression against entire populations. Furthermore, there are speculative trends, and these do not turn products into useful goods. Disproportionate wealth has also contributed to the global economic crisis and also prepares the basis for the bursting of a new bubble. Nonetheless, the large media channels, private media channels, say nothing and state what they want in their headlines. In Venezuela they state that there is a dictatorship. Nonetheless, the truth is completely different, and I want the conference to take note of the fact that we recently celebrated clean elections with full democratic guarantees, and the electoral process in Venezuela has the most number of audits across the world, as well as it being digital. And so there is no way to cheat. We had a total of 45 per cent of people registered to vote. Venezuela has a population of 20 million citizens. In other words, 93 per cent of people who were eligible to vote were registered to vote. This is one of the highest percentages in the world and we are very proud that, in facing these manoeuvres against our democracy, we have still had such high participation, remembering that voting is not compulsory. I need to emphasize that in Venezuela voting is not compulsory, and we still had such high electoral participation. The President, Nicolás Maduro, has renewed dialogue with all sectors, and this should serve to resolve all our differences in a constructive dialogue so that we can overcome this economic war. Finally, I would like to say on behalf of my government ... Thank you.

Government (Philippines)

Mr President, on behalf of the Philippine Government and Secretary Silvestre He Bello III, who sincerely regrets his absence in the conference, I congratulate you for your esteemed leadership in this conference. I would also like to commend Director-General, Guy Ryder, for his comprehensive report on the Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality which calls on the tripartite constituents to take concrete action to advance the rights and working conditions of women at work around the world. Mr President, allow me to express our gratitude on the decision of the ILO Governing Body for policing violence against women and men in the world of work, in the standard-setting item of this year's conference. This is so timely as gender gaps remain widespread worldwide. Issues confronting women at work continue to persist, from limited access to labour markets to restricted employment opportunities, from discrimination to violence and harassment. We, however, take pride to note that based on the global gender gap report of the World Economic Forum, the Philippines, for the last three years, has been consistently ranked in the top ten countries out of 144 as having one of the narrow gender gap based on progress on educational attainment, health and survival, economic participation and opportunity, and political empowerment. At the domestic front, our President, Rodrigo Roa Duterte, is making his promise to end shameful labour practice. The shameful practices being referred to are the illicit labour-only contracting or endo employment contract. Last May 1, during the Philippine Labour Day celebration, the President signed Executive Order 51, reiterating the state policy of ensuring job security for all workers based on social justice. This came following tripartite consultations to address the social partners most pressing concerns on non-standard forms of employment or endo employment contract. The presidential issuance affirmed the prohibition of illegal contracting and subcontracting. It gave way to two important roles of tripartite cooperation. First, a list of the work that may be contracted out will be issued by the Secretary of Labour and Employment, in consultation with the National Tripartite Industrial Peace Council. Second, inspection of establishments shall be conducted by authorized representatives by the Department of Labour and Employment, including labour employment representatives. At the international front, the Philippines is unrelenting in pushing for fair and humane treatment of our overseas workers, especially women, migrant workers. They are, on varying degrees, subjected to violence at work and experience abuse and inhumane treatment. We have actively engaged labour-receiving countries to afford full protection of rights and promotion of welfare of our overseas Philippine workers, especially female household workers. This we do by forging bilateral labour agreements with host countries. To date, the Philippines has forged 37 labour agreements with 23 countries, of which 17 are from the Middle East, 7 from Asia and the Pacific, and 13 from Europe and the Americas. But these initiatives of the Philippine Government are not enough to sufficiently protect the rights and promote the welfare of migrant workers. Much remains to be done. Among which is the need for more responsive international cooperation tools to enable governments and stakeholders to provide safer and more suitable migrant blueprint. Mr President, the Director-General's report shows on a nugget scale the status of gender quality in the world. It is heart-breaking to note that, despite global interventions, not only by the ILO but other international organizations, we have yet to achieve gender equality of this technologically advanced age. We beg for answer, Mr President, when will this culture of inequality end? Thank you, Mr President.

Government (Greece)

Chairman, distinguished representatives, ladies and gentlemen, it is a great honour for me to address the 107th plenary Session of the International Labour Conference, which takes place in an extremely critical period. Societies are being reformed in all their aspects due to globalization, dynamic technological developments and demographic changes, but gender inequality in political, social, professional and even family life has become a timeless phenomenon. In this respect, this year's Report of the ILO's Director-General makes our debate highly interesting, especially since a Standard Setting Committee in this year's conference is working on the sensitive subject of violence and harassment against women and men at work. Let me first refer to this issue. The Greek Government has actively shown the priority that abides by the issue of domestic violence by ratifying recently the Council of Europe Convention on preventing and combatting violence against women and especially domestic violence. Moreover, for women who are victims of violence and are accommodated in hostels and have left their homes, we are implementing a programme called 'Housing and Work for the Homeless', which covers the lodging costs and facilitates their reintegration into the labour market. And let me now come to the issue of gender inequality at work. Female unemployment in Greece is much higher than male unemployment. It stands at 26.1 per cent versus 17.8 per cent, which is the male unemployment. The female part-time employment is also much higher than the male one, and we definitely cannot ignore the issue of gender pay gap. Despite its small reduction the last years, it still remains high. In order to address these inequalities, the Greek Government has prepared a National Action Plan on Gender Equality 2016-2020. The objectives are encouraging women's participation in the labour market, promoting the principle of equality in enterprises, promoting female entrepreneurship, improving the situation of women in the agricultural sector, encouraging the use of information and communication technologies by women, reconciling work and family life. To this end, we have taken specific measures, specific policy measures, in order to address the low rates of female participation in the labour market. First, we introduced substantial changes in the way the public employment organization operates. Now, when employers seek to recruit workers through the organization registry, they do not have access, they cannot actually see the gender of the unemployed person. Thus, their selection is based solely on the qualifications of jobseekers and do not see their gender. Secondly, we have addressed the lack of available, affordable and quality care services for children since this is a factor that further hinders women's participation in the labour market. The past three years, the Government has almost doubled the number of kindergartens that can accommodate children for free. In 2018, we have substantially increased family allowances. As a result, the majority of families received increased subsidies. In addition to care policies related to children and other dependent members, we are implementing a number of family-friendly and mother-friendly regulations. The current framework in Greece prohibits the termination of a female worker's contract by the employer both during her pregnancy and also for a period of 18 months after childbirth. In 2017, we legislated for the extension of maternity protection, also to mothers who have babies through a surrogacy arrangement. Finally, in order to challenge the stereotypes and encourage women to enter the sector of Information and Communication Technologies, which is marked by high gender segregation, we are implementing relevant training programmes that offer women the possibility to acquire new skills in new technologies and information technology. Ladies and gentlemen, these were some of the practices, some of the measures that the Greek government is implementing to target gender inequality at work, and I hope that sharing our experience will help our conference to make progress towards our common goal, achieving equality at all levels. And let me once again congratulate the ILO for this initiative, and thank you very much for your attention.

Mr Otaredian

Employer (Islamic Republic of Iran)

Mr President, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, the ILO Director-General rightly depicted different challenges facing women at work, including unequal pay, domestic restrictions, work and family issues, harassment and gender-based discrimination. There exists invisible, unofficially acknowledged barriers that impeded women from a balanced participation in the labour market, business market, appointment to management and professional positions, advancing to senior leadership positions in countries, and in some cases, even segregation in the workplace. The challenges facing women in societies, specifically at work, have common roots with the problems that prevent the emancipation of women in any other sphere. It can all be traced back to the patriarchal system embedded within societies that deems women to be incapable of handling power and responsibility. Patriarchal beliefs, reinforced in societies, will continuously refuse to believe that a woman can take charge of affairs and is well capable of making smart, wise decisions that are binding to everyone. The reality is that patriarchal attitudes are not an issue of the past. Such attitudes towards women still exist in societies all over the world today, in both developed and developing countries less or more. In the past few decades, however, the cultural work within male-dominated professions and the stereotypical gender role for women in our societies has been drastically changed, and it is very encouraging. Women can be seen as leaders of their countries, fighter jet pilots, educationists, company executives, banking and administrative heads, human resources and telecom executives. Women of the households are now also financially supporting their families. Though the number of women working is increasing day by day, but still there are certain barriers that they have to cross to prove themselves beneficial for the job market. Ladies and gentlemen, the ILO Director-General has laid out in his report five building blocks for the advancement of women at work. In order to face equality challenges successfully, it would seem that two other forces are worthy of due attention. The first one is erasing the patriarchal system and the stereotypical gender rule by providing diversity education and training to societies. And the second one is awareness raising and capacity building by women themselves in order to be self-confident. To sum up, Mr President, the lack of representation for women in the male-dominated societies is evident all over the world. It is only a variation of degree in which [vgr INAUDIBLE 4:48] changes all across the globe. Trends however are changing, with increased awareness about women's rights and attacks on patriarchal attitudes all over the world. We may one day see women being subject to the same standards as men are in societies. We cannot forecast when that can happen, but increased awareness is the key. The ILO should concentrate on achievable objectives on pushing for gender equality, while reflecting national circumstances as to the country's traditional male-dominated societies. Ladies and gentlemen, thank you all for your kind attention.

Government (Poland)

Mr Chair, ladies and gentlemen, the current session of the International Labour Conference is the last one before centenary to be celebrated. Since 2013 we have been using this forum to discuss matters related to the future of work, social security, green jobs, women at work or governance. The key tool allowing us to review trends, identify threats and opportunities and to prepare for the next century of the International Labour Organization is dialogue in all its forms, the tripartite social dialogue in particular. Complex and dynamic developments in the world of work, shaped by such phenomena as technological revolution, demographic and climate change, have a far-reaching impact on social dialogue. On one hand, they put its effectiveness into question. On the other hand, it is commonly reported that social dialogue is now particularly in demand. The Polish Government appreciates the role social dialogue and social partners for shaping the future of work and implements appropriate action. The most important institution of social dialogue in Poland is the Social Dialogue Council that replaced, in 2015, the Tripartite Commission for Social and Economic affairs. Thanks to its wide statutory competencies, the Council can have a real impact on the ongoing social and economic developments. The intensity and quality of its activities are reflected in the effects. The Council, as well as workers' and employers' parties, have adopted over 80 resolutions. More than 1,300 draft acts have been submitted to consultation, including over 1,000 governmental drafts. The Council has become a forum for exchanging opinions, confronting views, and reaching agreements. This is the result of the joint efforts taken by social partners and the Government. Strong social partners are an indispensable component of a good social dialogue. Therefore the Polish Parliament is finalizing works on the amendment to the law on trade unions, drafted by the Government, which gives the right to establish and join trade unions organizations to workers and other persons performing work under other relationships than the employment contract, including the self-employment working for an entity under a contract. The draft also provides for protective mechanisms to guarantee trade unionists not being employees to remain independent of employers, autonomous and free in action, as well as extends its right to conduct collective bargaining. The Government in Poland has also recognized that developments on the labour market require a new approach to the legal regulations on non-standard employment relationships, as well as concerning the employment of non-workers and the relations between employers and workers' representatives. Therefore, it has appointed a Codification Committee for the Labour Law, with social partners' representatives being among their members. The Committee has just completed its activities, having prepared its original draft of the collective and individual labour code. Some of the effects of the Committee's activities will be used by the Government in future work. Ladies and gentlemen, during this year's session, the plenary discussion focuses on the Director-General's report The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality. The report points out existing inequalities and barriers in terms of equal access to the labour market for women and men. The inequalities refer both to the opportunities for women to work under the same condition as men, equal pay, the situation of women on the labour market and their greater burden with unpaid work in the households than is the case for men. Poland finds these matters particularly important. Engaging in providing decent living conditions for families, caring for children and assisting older family members make it easier to push women out of the labour market. That implies the necessity to introduce facilitations and improvements contributing to their remaining on the labour market. Inequalities on the labour market hinder economic growth in the future. In particular if they lead to exclusion by impairing intergenerational mobility and social cohesion. Poland believes that supporting women on the labour market needs to be multi-dimensional. It is necessary to involve the State and the social system existing therein to ensure care for mothers who cease to be professionally active after giving birth to the child but wish to pursue their professional career in the future. Maternity or paternity leaves and allowances are favourable in this respect, as they allow to maintain an appropriate quality of life, and they are paid from the social security system with no additional burden for employers and allow women to return to the labour market in the future. Poland cares for the female citizens by granting one-year long maternity leaves and ensuring that pension contributions are paid by the State. This should contribute to closing the gap between the future pensions of women and men. The accessibility of childcare is an important component of the activity promoting the employment of women. That is why Poland systematically supports the development of different forms of care for babies and young children. In the years 2010-2017, these actions have resulted in over eightfold increase in the number of all care facilities for children up to three years. [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:15] I thank you for your attention.

Worker (Chile)

Thank you very much. First of all we would like to greet the officers of the ILO, the Secretary-General and all present delegations. It is an honour for me to talk to you on behalf of the Workers' delegation of Chile. We welcome the ILO's goal to build a future with decent work based on the report presented by the ILO's Director-

General and on the report of the Chairperson and the Governing Body. We are the CUT, Chile's Historic Central Trade Union, which has been borne of the political struggles for giving dignity, decent work and social justice to our workers. In August 1988, our union was reformed and it played a key role in the democratic recovery of our country. This year we celebrate 30 years from that date. As a trade union, we firmly believe in the values underpinning the ILO's Constitutions. Work is not a commodity. Poverty in any place is a threat to prosperity throughout the world. Social justice, given shape through social dialogue, through the negotiation and adoption of tripartite agreements, is the best way for ensuring lasting peace and eradicating poverty. Trade union freedom is essential if we are to achieve lasting progress. We believe in dialogue in gender equality and the elimination of all forms of discrimination. We believe in fair rules for all because as a society we have an interest in men, women, young people and children all doing well. That is why we firmly believe in tripartism as a key tool for ensuring that these values translate into reality in the life of workers, their families and societies in general. In the face of these responsibilities, there are two virtues that we workers, men and women alike, should be guided by. These are autonomy and unity of workers. Both of these are essential in the world of work, and we should never lose sight of them. Autonomy, from governments, from employers, from political parties and from all those who pursue other goals than the great well-being of workers. Unity, in order to achieve social progress for our comrades but also in order to establish new forms of human relations. In Chile, a new right-wing Government has just taken office, and just like in 2011, when the Students Movement achieved quite considerable medium-term results, we, from this podium, would like to pay tribute to women's movements in Chile. Women's movements against violence, not just physical and sexual violence but also violence at the workplace, which can be seen in wage policies where women suffer economically because we earn a third less than men for equal work and because we have a womb we have to pay 70 per cent more to the healthcare schemes. We are penalized also in our pension system where we get 30 per cent less than men, and that brings us straight down to the poverty line. Over and beyond women's rights issues, when a government changes you should not just assume that civil servants are a booty or excess fat. Currently, there have been a number of dismissals because of different views being held, and that does no good to democracy. During the government of President Michelle Bachelet, a labour reform was completed, and it was aimed at enhancing collective labour rights and bringing trade union freedom, collective bargaining and striking rights into line with ILO standards. Now of course this reform was not perfect, and some steps forward are still pending, but the problem is that less than a year since this text entered into force, the Government now, which is egged on by fearmongers who are scared of trade union rights, is proposing administrative and legal initiatives that backtrack on what was achieved. We have no time for this. On the contrary, what we need is to deepen the regulation of, and protection of, the most precarious sectors such as the call centre sector for instance, which makes an abusive use of young and female workforces and where basic rights, such as that of going to the toilet, are not even guaranteed. That is tantamount to slave labour. Amongst the major social demands which have been expressed on the streets is the right to comprehensive and dignified social security. That includes fair pensions. The current pension administration system follows a market-based logic which has been denounced by our trade union, and in fact there were three footnotes calling on the Government to reform this system. Therefore, we urge the government to put the matter, the ratification of ILO Convention 102, before Parliament as a matter of urgency. We denounce before this assembly the disproportionate response of police forces, vis-à-vis students, women and our Mapuche brothers, which can be understood as a new logic of criminalizing social movements in various places, such as Brazil and Argentina. When a government lacks legitimacy or popular support, it resorts to violence and fear for governing. Finally, we declare that we are in a state of alarm before any attempt of the Government to modify through administrative ways the rights earned by Chile's workers. Thank you very much.

Mr Jurkovič

Government (The Holy See)

Madam Chair, the world is currently experiencing a fundamental structural change which requires an in-depth analysis and reconsideration of what labour is and what it means for the economy, society and policymaking. In the age of sustainable development, labour should remain an essential channel to build an inclusive society, leaving aside the superficial measurement of human progress only in terms of economic growth and the accumulation of material wealth. According to the Holy See, labour should mean participating and contributing to an inclusive society. This implies a revelation of work, seeing it as an essential expression of human person, as a means by which we can pursue self-realization. The inversion of the order between means and ends, where work as a good becomes an instrument and money an end, is a fertile ground for a reckless and amoral culture of waste. The catalyst of the structural change we are currently experiencing remains the rapidly growing field of technology. It is creating new challenges to which we have yet to come to terms. The economy has accepted advances of technology with the assumption that it has a merely positive impact for society. In reality, the evidence shows that it is not the case. Technology and globalization are playing a major role in the progressive polarization of labour market in both advanced and developing countries. In order to build a sustainable future, we also need to involve and rely on the next generations. The paradox is that whereas we should expect the greater contribution from the young, the trends inherited from the past and the present put youth in a marginal and vulnerable position. The world economy, although growing, is not able to create enough quality jobs, in particular for young people. There is an urgent need to recognize better and the equal rights of women in the labour market, to respect genuinely the tasks they carry out in their professional life, keeping in mind their aspiration within the family and within society as a whole. Unfortunately, reality nowadays still prevents many women from being employed, often due to a purely economic conception of society. Too often women still have to choose between family and work. Becoming a mother still remains a source of disadvantage at work. Every woman has the right to choose between being simultaneously a mother and carrying out a professional career, or being a mother and dedicating all her activities to the family. Family remains the fundamental unit of society, and hence needs to be protected. Women represent a vital part of family. Without a clear understanding of the aspect of human dignity, discrimination of women will never be overcome. Mr President, allow me in this context to reaffirm the concerns of the Holy See for those unfortunate situations where the dignity of women and men, workers, is vilified by violence, especially by sexual violence and harassment. It is therefore even more regrettable to witness the present attempt by some to hijack the preparatory text of the Commission, particularly Item 5, with the clear aim of introducing controversial concept in the new definitions that lack any scientific evidence or international consensus and which are driven by an ideological colonialism. Such attempts shy away from clearly addressing and effectively preventing the causes of violence in places of work and forget the need for authentic assistance to which victims of sexual harassment, women along with men, are entitled. By the way of conclusion, my delegation calls the international community to achieve real equality in every area of work. Our ability to recognize the dignity comes from the use of reason itself, which is able to understand the law of God written in the heart of every human being. Thank you, Madam Chair.

Mr Tokumaru

Employer (Japan)

Thank you, Madam Chair. Good afternoon ladies and gentlemen. It is my great honour being able to speak at this House as an employer representative of Japan. Let me first begin with the Sustainable Development Goals. In September 2015, the international community adopted a set of goals towards 2030, with a view of ending poverty and ensuring prosperity for all. Keidanren, Japan Business Federation, has revised charter of corporate behaviour last November, with the primary aim of proactive delivering on the SDGs. As mentioned in the DG report on ILO programmes implementation, it is of utmost importance that the ILO, as a member of the core group of UN development system, devote itself to achieving the goals, especially Goal 8. Decent work and economic growth is exactly what this House must address. In order to achieve this goal, we must first strengthen basis for the sustained growth through formation of industrial clusters, and thereby creating employment. The private sector is playing a vital role in this regard. Wide range of Japanese companies, from SMEs to major enterprises, are making foreign direct investment to developing countries, not only expanding opportunity for decent work but also offering vocational training to the employees. Also, it should be noted that the private sector is contributing towards tackling poverty and ensuring decent work. For example, in collaboration with the ILO, a Japanese company and an overseas affiliate have been funding a programme aiming at eradication of child labour. ILO budget alone wouldn't be sufficient in initiating this programme. Therefore, it is highly expected that this sort of private public partnership, PPP, would prevail. Madam Chair, let me turn to the domestic aspect of decent work. In Japan, a bill on the work reform is now under deliberation process as the National Diet. A ceiling on the overtime working hours will be introduced under the new legislation. Therefore, the Japanese business sector has already taken a step forward towards doing away with excessive working hours while raising productivity. For example, Keidanren, Japan Business Federation, is requesting its member companies to set up a voluntary action plan aiming at reducing overtime hours and encouraging employees to take paid leaves. As of today, more than 200 member companies have committed to the plan. Also, legislation on equal pay for equal work is going to be revised. We are committed to implementing the revised registration by eliminating unreasonable differences in the treatment between regular and non-regular workers, and by making ourselves accountable for differentiated treatment, should there be any. Eradication of harassment at workplace is another important issue in Japan. In March this year, the tripartite of Japan submitted a report on definition of harassment and its possible prevention measures with a view of drafting a guideline or relevant tools in the near future. In the meanwhile, adaptation of standards aiming at ending violence and harassment in the world of work is on the agenda of this House. We are of the view that instruments which allow for flexibility is desirable so that compatibility between domestic legislation of each member could be achieved in implementing the above standards. We look forward to contributing towards a fruitful outcome regarding this important issue. Finally, I'd like to close my speech by emphasizing once again that employers of Japan are committed to tripartite collaboration, addressing both international and domestic aspect of decent work. Thank you very much for your attention

Government (Indonesia)

Madam President, Excellencies, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, I would like to express my appreciation to the Director-General for his report The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality. Indonesia is of the view that improving female labour participation is one of the essential components to achieve the Sustainable Development Goals. Therefore, the Government of Indonesia has been developing various policies and programmes to increase labour participation rate of females and to provide better facilities for women workers, among others. First, launching the National Movement on Non-Discrimination at Work. Second, implementing guidelines on gender-neutral wages at work and prevention on sexual harassment at work. Third, establishing taskforce on Equal Employment Opportunity or EEO. Fourth, raising awareness and capacity of the local government officials and other stakeholders to implement EEO. Fifth, quota for each political party to have minimum 30 per cent female candidates to participate in elections. Indonesia welcomes the effort of the ILO to launch new push for equality and would like to share the following views on the proposed building blocks in the report. First, on a new care economy. We believe that the development of care economy prospective will help in promoting equality for women in the world at work. Hence, ILO needs to continue working closely with its constituents to ensure better investment in developing the decent care work at the national and global level. Second, on strengthening women's control over their time. We attach the importance of creating enabling environment to promote flexible yet productive working arrangements for women in informal work places, as well as ensuring sustainability of economic growth. Further study by the ILO is required on the promotion of inclusive social dialogue and collective bargaining to develop a work-family balance working time policy, that would also meet the needs of workers and employers. Third, on valuing women's work fairly. We underscore the need of the ILO to ensure better data collection based on sound methodology, which can be used to develop public policy and private sector programmes to better address decent work for women, including pay inequality and challenges faced by women workers in the formal and informal economy at national and global level. Fourth, on raising the voice and representation of women. ILO should continue its effort to provide policy advice and support for programme development at the country level to promote women's participation in the world of work. The Office should also continue to enforce its effort to achieve greater enforcement of women in the work of the organization. Fifth, on ending violence and harassment. Indonesia welcomes the standard setting discussions and looks forward for the future ILO instrument on the violence and harassment at the world of work. In this regard, we are pleased to inform that the implementation of Indonesia's Social Security Scheme already covers the protection of workers against violence and harassment at work. Madam President, Indonesia stands ready to working closely with the ILO, social partners and other stakeholders to achieving our goal to improve the living and working conditions of women and men. Finally, Madam Chair, as we are now approaching the 100th anniversary of the organization next year, let us harness our partnership and effort to implement the seven Centenary Initiative, including women at work incentive to ensure decent work for all women and men. I thank you.

Mr Yomura

Government (Brazil)

Madam Chair, Director-General Guy Ryder, Ministers, ladies and gentlemen, I extend my greetings to all the present delegations, and I thank the Director-General of the ILO, Guy Ryder, for his report which looks at Women at Work in the ILO, and this aims to attach the main problems which still stand in the way of gender equality in the world of work. The Brazilian Government is strongly committed to promoting gender equality and has taken many measures in this direction. And I would like to mention the broadening of the rights for domestic workers, the increase in paternity and maternity leave, as well as the increase in number of places for day care, which strengthen the economic independence of women and promote gender equality in the world of work. I would also like to mention that, in terms of women's representation, we have the National Forum for Women in Political Parties and the platform for more Women in Power, which are both promoted by the National Secretariat for Policies for Women. Now I must mention the Maria da Penha Law, which will be 11 years old in August, as legislation to combat harassment and violence, and has been recognized by the United Nations as one of the most progressive legislations to face domestic violence and family-based violence against women. We hope that the ILO will continue to do its work as we move towards starting the second centenary of the organization. In order for us achieve real gender equality, we must take into consideration future challenges and reassess the traditional gender roles. In line with this, Brazil has promoted the modernization of its labour legislation in order to increase flexibility in time management for workers as well as rebalancing the relationship between personal and professional life. Today, it is possible for men to have a working day that is more appropriate to being able to carry out family based duties, a role that was disproportionately put on women. Today, we should have greater use of teleworking, and this will allow us to have better management of family and work time. We have ended our outdated and excessively rigid legislation which discriminated against women when it came to contracting, without neglecting the necessary protection for those who are living in real vulnerable situations. We value collective bargaining and the independence of workers, whilst guaranteeing protecting their rights, modernizing labour law, and these are a new moment in history in labour relations in Brazil. We have also avoided the judicialization and ensured that there is greater legal certainty. We will see the products of this, and we have seen resistance to these reforms, particularly from sectors that are very stuck to paternalistic practices of the past. We have a strong commitment to trade union freedom, and we have committed ourselves to the Conventions of the ILO. I would like to repeat that we are in line with the ILO's Conventions. If we look at the progress that has been made, we have seen the growth in the economy as well as a reduction in inflation as well as interest rates. We have also seen an increase in the number of jobs being offered. There have been natural oscillations, and these have influenced the indicators. Nonetheless, it is possible that we will, by the end of 2018, have an employment rate of 12 per cent. As my predecessor in the Ministry, I would like to reaffirm my highest esteem for this organization, which has a great responsibility in promoting decent work and social dialogue. And it is for that reason that I have a duty to ensure that there are deep-rooted reforms in our standard setting system from the perspective of governments, and the organization must strengthen its technical character as well as strengthening cooperation and constructive dialogue. Thank you.

Ms Teketel

Government (Ethiopia)

Madam Chair, ladies and gentlemen, first of all, let me begin by congratulating the President and his Vice-Presidents on their election to preside over the 107th Session of the ILC. I am confident that under their wise leadership the conference will achieve its full success. Let me commend the Director-General of the ILO, Mr Guy Ryder, for giving us a comprehensive and informative report on Women at Work. I would also like to express my gratitude to the Chairperson of the Governing Body of the ILO for the wide-ranging annual report. Madam Chair, Ethiopia welcomes the Women at Work initiative with utmost appreciation. It is, in fact, a very crucial and, I think, a long overdue issue. As clearly put in the report, women are predominantly engaged in low paid occupations and economic activities. That, in effect, results in segregation and gender wage gap, a vicious cycle that needs to be broken because changing the situation of women is changing the situation of half the world of work. I would gladly take this opportunity to demonstrate Ethiopia's full commitment to work for achievement of this golden initiative that aims at protecting women from discrimination and harassment and pushing for gender equality at work, labour market and decision-making positions. This initiative, which goes in line with various international legal instruments on gender equality and women empowerment, is also very much consistent with Ethiopia's National Constitution and development policies. We have also finalized the amendment of our National Labour Law. We believe would contribute significantly to better working conditions for women. The Ethiopian Government has been implementing a set of policy measures and strategies that streamline women empowerment in all domains, political, economic and social spheres. Witnessing rapid national economy growth and political reform, currently Ethiopia, more than any time else, is determined to promote gender equality and social justice to achieve sustainable development in the country. Women's representation in the Ministry and Cabinet, Parliament and other important decision-making positions, has been progressively increasing in our country. Women are taking up key leadership positions in the Government structure. That's why I am here today. However, we still have a very long way to go as so many women are still subjected to discrimination, violence and harassment at workplaces, not only in their home country but also in their destinations as labour migrants outside their home. Madam Chair, I would like to say that women's condition at work is highly interwoven with a mindset of their respective societies. The challenge is therefore deep-rooted and very much attached to the existing social and cultural structures. It therefore requires a high-level collaborative engagement and a special creative approach. Madam Chair, on behalf of the Ethiopian Government, and on my own behalf as a woman, once again I would like to reiterate my appreciation to the ILO for picking up such a valuable initiative. We really need to put together our efforts to make this initiative winning. Finally, ladies and gentlemen, let me take this opportunity to thank the Director-General for the invaluable efforts he has made in promoting the 1986 amendment to the ILO Constitution. While appreciating member States that had responded to the promotion measures by the Office, my delegation would like to call upon member States that have not yet ratified this amendment, to do so as soon as possible. And I thank you very much.

Employers (Indonesia)

Madam President, Minister, Director-General and distinguished delegates, good afternoon. Madam President, APINDO is delighted to be part of employer and community that are actively cooperating with ILO by assigning feedback and giving essential input for creating constructive solution in promoting labour standards. APINDO believes that conducive business climate will generate better nation productivity, increase employment and improve decent work. In order to achieve the economic sustainability element, APINDO engaged all business player and strategy planners in stimulating higher productivity and encouraging decent employment opportunity, which could bring benefit for our Sustainable Development Goals. That includes sustainable economic growth, social inclusiveness and decent work for all. Moreover, the recent challenges for employers to create a green job in green economy framework, a member of global community, APINDO, also share the same concern about sustainability in our planet which eventually has impact on the working world. APINDO believes that it's necessary to collaborate together in seeking initiatives to preserve the planet in which we live, and at the same time sustaining our effort to create jobs with better implementation. Madam President, APINDO developed a number of semi-autonomous APINDO bodies to support SDGs. Which are, APINDO training centre, Indonesian National Apprentice Network affiliated with global apprentice network, and Certification Bureau for industrial relation resource. The body contribute to human resource development through harmonious industrial relation approach. For example, Collective Labour Agreement, with [vgr INAUDIBLE 2:42] discussion, social security productivity, apprenticeship and vocational training. In order to confront the challenges of Industrial Revolution 4.0, APINDO, together with the Government, have escalated the labour skill and competences, the one done by conducting National Apprentice Movement. Through this programme, APINDO encouraged approximately 2,600 companies to implement apprenticeships in workplace. APINDO commit to synergize; they have done this by recruiting several companies that profusely helped apprentice programme to boost awareness on apprenticeship to facilitate the [vgr INAUDIBLE 3:23] information in apprentice practice and to reduce skill mismatch between the fresh graduate and the business sector demand. Mr President, APINDO has also been putting a tremendous effort to comply with ILO fundamental principle. Nevertheless, APINDO still captures several labour market challenges in Indonesia. Social dialogue in labour relation [vgr INAUDIBLE 3:51] could be declared of state's policy. The Government has the responsibility to setting appropriate policy legal regulatory framework of the superficial guarantee to coherent social dialogue policy. Despite the challenges of [vgr INAUDIBLE 4:09], the need for strengthening government roles should be expanded to raise public participation. Method of technology [vgr INAUDIBLE 4:19] ICT application have to be implemented by a related stakeholder appropriately to support work process social dialogue with the Government. Madam President, in regard the [vgr INAUDIBLE 4:32] conference on violence and harassment in the world of work, I should put at harmony with legal system of each member country to make it implementable. Madam President, to conclude our speech, APINDO hopes that the plenary meeting will generate better improvement in order to support the Sustainable Development Goals, which especially aim to attain systematic economy growth, social inclusiveness, decent work for all. Hopefully, within our effort, together conducting the new objective solution for work, we could get a better business sustainability and better future of decent work. I thank you.

Government (South Africa)

Your Excellency, Madam President, Vice-Presidents, distinguished delegates, the preamble of the ILOs Constitution is instructive, and it is as relevant today as it was 100 years ago. It has provided a solid foundation and a point of reference for our work. Let us recall that this seminal declaration states two fundamental things: that universal peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice and that the failure of any nation to adopt human labour standards may be an obstacle in the way of social justice. As we approach the ILO centenary in 2019, the Report of the Director-General is apt when it reminds us that, whilst we have made major progress since our inception in 1919, there are still numerous challenges that confront us right now, and those are guaranteed that would emerge as we move forward. It is true that in those areas where we have moved forward as a collective, the impact has been much greater. And likewise, in those areas where collective efforts have been erratic and or non-existent, progress has been dismal. We must accept that we work in an environment that is so dynamic and changes happen much quicker and are more complex than it was the case in the formative years of the ILO. This will therefore require high levels of sophistication when designing and crafting interventions. Madam President, the first president of the democratic South Africa, the late Nelson Mandela, was apt when he said, and I quote, “After climbing a great hill, one only finds that there are many more hills to climb.” The Report of the Director-General reminds us that whilst we have reasons to celebrate our achievements to date, there is equally a lot of work to do. Let me, albeit briefly, give some sound bites of how South Africa is doing in meeting our obligations on the main thrust of the DG's report covering just the thematic pillars. On the call for the new push for equality, noting the harsh reality that women continue to be paid far less than men across the world even when they do the work of equal value. In pursuit of our efforts to address this challenge, we have reviewed our Employment Equity legal framework by introducing the principle of equal pay for work of equal value. We have also made compliance with the Employment Equity law, a pre-condition to do business with the State, which is both a carrot and a stick. Every designated employer will require a letter of good standing on the employment equity compliance before it could be considered as a service provider to the State and its organs. Whilst we understand that law only on its own will not be sufficient to achieve the desired outcomes, we are also upscaling our inspection and enforcement and rolling out awareness programmes in partnership with our social partners. Violence is considered a crime in our laws, and harassment in the world of work is no different. Workers have an option of pursuing claims of violence and harassment in the world of work, either through labour dispute resolution routes or criminally. We understand that for this ambition to work it will require a paradigm shift in dealing with the stigma and victimization that is perennial on such matters. Workers themselves will need to be firm in standing up against the perpetrators and not to back off at critical stages of the processes. Social dialogue and tripartism is evolving and new challenges emerge given that social dialogue does not exist in isolation to the social economic and dual political realities. South Africa constantly evaluates and assesses methods of enhancing not so much processes but the quality of the outcomes. Our model of social dialogue is not necessarily tripartite in character, but more than that, giving women, youth cooperatives and civic associations a part of the social dialogue institutional arrangements. Whilst it is working relatively well, there will always be room for improvement. And our social dialogue and tripartism was put to a test recently when our social partners were seized with negotiating the very first national minimum wage legislation for South Africa. It was a difficult, but robust process which resulted in the social partners concluding far-reaching agreements on a range of key modalities of what national minimum wage legislation should look like. The resilience of our social dialogue was again tested recently when we engaged our social partners on key amendments on labour relations legislation and the Basic Conditions of Employment Act. Whilst there were disagreements in some areas, which is very normal in true social dialogue, these were handled with delicate care and with incredible levels of mutual respect. We stand ready to make our contribution in addressing the challenges raised in the social report. We are also ready to share our experiences and learn from every single member of this body in order to enhance the quality of the outcomes. We thank the ILO and the ILO leadership located in our country office in Pretoria for their support when we navigate some of the difficult macro and cross-border challenges. Let us all put our shoulders behind the new push for equality in order to make social justice a reality in our lifetime, and I thank you very much.

Government (Uruguay)

Director-General of the ILO, Mr Guy Ryder, Chairman of the International Labour Conference, Mr Samir Murad, once again, the ILC in one of its committees is looking at the topic of social dialogue and tripartism, which are anchored in this organization's best practices and the guiding thread of which comes from the Declaration of Philadelphia and the ILO's Constitution itself. In this case, our country's Government would like to reflect about these two institutions, taking as a starting point our national reality which is rich in experiences in social dialogue and tripartism. Over the last 13 years, our country has developed a policy of social dialogue for the governance of labour relations, which repeatedly makes use of prior consultation, tripartism, inclusive collective bargaining and broadened inclusive social dialogue. Such actions have enabled us to develop constantly, and this has been recognized by other UN agencies. In terms of legislation, we have proclaimed more than 30 laws which have helped update labour legislation and social security legislation on issues such as outsourcing, the protection of trade union activities, the reform of labour processes, new statutes for rural workers and domestic workers, for night work, and for making the pension system more flexible, as well as reforming the unemployment benefit system. In terms of occupational safety and health, we have strengthened the National Council for Occupational Health and Safety, which is a tripartite institution and which has developed through consultation a large number of decrees and protocols. In terms of remuneration, we tend to convene wage councils which are tripartite bodies, the purpose of which is to set minimum wages for each sector and each labour category. These bodies have yielded countless agreements and often collective agreements, which thus cover almost all workers in the private sector. The overwhelming majority of these agreements were reached by unanimity. The Superior Tripartite Council has served as a consultation body, not just for setting minimum wages at the national level but also in terms of other standards such as the decree that regulates night work or recruitment and employment agencies, or I could also mention the bill on labour for persons with disabilities. Tripartism has been playing its role for 25 years, and we are as a consequence successfully managing our social security system at the national level. There is the board of the Social Security Bank which comprises workers, employers, taxpayer representatives and the government. And let me inform you that this institute handles the largest amount of public funds in our country. Another noteworthy example of successful tripartism is the National Institution for Employment and Vocational Training. This also comprises workers, employers and governments, and it underpins vocational training in our country. What is interesting is that all of these social dialogue experiences have been the driving force for a necessary formulization of the job market. Since 2005, almost half a million workers have entered the formal sector, and this means they are closer to decent jobs, and we have also included sectors of society which for many years lay outside of the virtual circle of formality. Another topic which this conference is looking at is that of harassment at work. It is a very complex issue. The idiosyncrasies of each sector and the culture of each country or region are of great significance here, and our country is not immune to the matter. Notwithstanding the fact that this conference has decided to talk about establishing an international standard, in Uruguay we have been regulating it already through law, particularly concerning sexual harassment, and also through other forms such as collective bargaining. Mr Director-General, at a time of great transformation in the world of work which is threatened as we know it because of the digital revolution, social dialogue in all of its shapes and forms, tripartism, consultation, dialogue per se and collective bargaining, stands out as the best tool for tackling any reform that aims at changing labour law or the collective relations within a regional country. Social dialogue, for all the transformations that have affected the world of work, remains the central part of this organization's standard setting system. Thank you very much.

Employer (Bahrain)

Madam Chair, Your Excellencies, Heads of delegations, ladies and gentlemen, it is my pleasure to take part in the sessions and deliberations of this session of the ILC as representative of the business community in the Kingdom of Bahrain. In my personal capacity, and on behalf of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Bahrain and of the private sector, I would like to express our thanks and appreciation to all the participants in this conference. We commend the efforts deployed by the ILO in collaboration with the production partners worldwide in order to enhance cooperation and coordination and to uphold the principles of a constructive social dialogue and to answer the concerns of labour and achieve justice for all, hence reinforcing the stability and the relationship between the three partners and creating a sustainable, enabling business environment. Ladies and gentlemen, developing or investing in the economic potential of women is central to the strategy adopted by Bahrain to develop the capabilities of women and to promote her status as a businesswoman. Therefore, the national strategy for the promotion of women was adopted by the Supreme Council for Women with the support of his Highness the King. This strategy focuses on the economic empowerment of women, and it targets working women, businesswomen and the women working in their households as well as women with special needs. The strategy guarantees the adoption and implementation of economic policies for working women besides a training and development programme to empower women economically to provide just social security for women, as well as elaborating a programme in collaboration with the governmental organizations and with regional funding institutions to improve the job opportunities for women and to increase their income. The Bahraini women have also been present at the international level as members of the CSW, and also as members of the Executive Council of UN Women. UN Women has also launched the award of Princess Sabeeka Al Kahlifa for the empowerment of women, and they have inaugurated their bureau in Bahrain in the presence of the Deputy Secretary-General and the Executive Director of UN Women. Women in Bahrain occupy senior executive positions in the private sector. They are CEOs and Director-Generals, and they are also active in new areas of work. Women in Bahrain play an active role in the development of the private sector, through working in that sector or through owning and managing production enterprises. The number of female workers in the private sector went from 19,000 in 2006 to 31,000 female workers in 2017, and it is worth mentioning that women are also present in the decision-making positions. They are active in the public and political arenas, and they are also present in the Shura Council and the Parliament. Ladies and gentlemen, the Israeli constraints imposed on the Palestinian territories have increased unemployment, which has reached 27 per cent, especially after imposing harsh restrictions on the movement of workers and goods from and to the Gaza strip, leading to a drop in the Palestinian economy. Hence the importance of the international cooperation and coordination and supporting the efforts of all stakeholders to alleviate the restrictions imposed on the workers in the occupied Palestinian territories, which have negative repercussions on labour and economy. We therefore reiterate that the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Bahrain fully supports the right of the Palestinian workers to work in the occupied Palestinian land with Jerusalem as its capital. Madam Chair, ladies and gentlemen, we hope that this conference will come up with effective Recommendations, enhancing the skills of women and allowing them to go along with the different developments to achieve a full partnership between the two genders, thus contributing to social justice. We also hope to come up with binding Recommendations for all the constituents, given the seriousness of what was mentioned by the Director-General's report, and thank you.

Government (Mozambique)

Madam Chair, President, Director-General, on behalf of the Republic of Mozambique, we congratulate you, Mr President, on your election, and we congratulate Director-General, Guy Ryder, and his team for the excellent work and dynamism with which they have been implementing the objectives of the ILO. We are doing this at a time at which our organization is preparing itself to commemorate, in 2019, its centenary. His Excellency Mr Filipe Nyusi, President of the Republic of Mozambique, visited the headquarters of the ILO in February this year, and with this gesture he wanted to give a clear signal of his unwavering support to this organization and to our bilateral cooperation. The ILO is facing a number of different challenges, and these can only be overcome through our collective engagement and in the implementation of effective strategies aiming to achieve the Sustainable Development objectives, particularly number 8, in line with the principle of leaving no one behind. Your Excellencies, in the context of ensuring that we fulfil our obligations, we are pleased to inform you that the Government submitted to the Assembly of the Republic all the instruments that have been adopted by the ILO between 1996 and 2017. Therefore, in 2017, Mozambique ratified the protocol to Convention 29 on forced Labour, protocol to Convention 81 on labour inspection, and Convention 176 on safety and health in mines. This year we ratified the Maritime Labour Convention. The Government has approved an action plan for employment policy, the national plan to combat the worst forms of child labour, and we are currently looking at reforming our labour law. In line in our fight against the worst forms of child labour, Mozambique has for the first time now a list of jobs that are considered dangerous for children. Our Government continues to be committed in promoting social dialogue which is productive and continuous, and this can be attested by the regular participation of government members in the Labour Advisory Committee. Excellencies, the Director-General's report emphasized the importance of promoting gender equality, fighting against discrimination across the board, and our Government believes this matter is of a highest priority. Recently, we reviewed the gender policy and strategy for its implementation, and we will soon be approving it. The Government has carried out actions with an aim to eliminate discrimination against women and to highlight the value of women in families and in societies. In terms of implementing the Convention on maternity protection, Mozambique has increased maternity leave to 90 days for civil servants. This action strengthens and increases the protection of women and mothers as well as increasing protection for infants. One key action carried out by the Government is strengthening women's participation in decision-making bodies at all levels, thus guaranteeing equal opportunities and increasing positive discrimination. We believe it is important to promote equal opportunities between men and women. Ladies and gentlemen, Excellencies, Mozambique continues to carry out efforts to promote tripartite social dialogue because this is the fundamental tool for us to achieve social justice and peace. Mozambique reaffirms its commitment to promoting decent work, which is the major objective of this organization. Thank you.

Worker (Zambia)

Good afternoon, the Chairperson, fellow delegates, ladies and gentlemen. On behalf of Zambian workers, I wish to thank you very much for the opportunity to speak in this plenary session. Indeed, this 107th Session of the International Labour Conference has covered a wide range of subjects relating to the dynamics of the world of work. In particular, the Report of the Director-General provides leadership and a decisive position of ILO from the past hesitations to place the issue of gender equality on the agenda and putting on the spotlight challenges of harassment and discrimination in the world of work. Chairperson, we agree with the Director-General's report that women face a number of challenges in society and particularly in the workplace. Progress to realising gender equality has been slow, and the hard reality remains that women continue to face discrimination and harassment in workplaces. As we continue the discussions on ending violence and harassment in the world of work, we are hopeful that we may have a new ILO Convention to strengthen the fight for women's right in the world of work. Chairperson, ladies and gentlemen, the report of the Chairperson of the Governing Body also reminds us of the previous commitments we have made to ensure that our aspiration to ensure gender equality in all spheres of work is reflected even in the composition of our national delegations to the International Labour Conference. However, our assessment of the list of delegates to this conference has confirmed that we are still behind in this commitment. Therefore, we support the resolve to request the Director-General after every conference, as well as regional meetings, to continue to bring the issue to the attention of members and groups that had not reached the minimum target of 30 per cent of women's participation with the goal of gender parity. Furthermore, it is true from the Director-General's report that the employment situation globally remains precarious, despite relative global economic growth. The picture is worse in African countries, where employment is largely in the informal economy, with only about 10 per cent of the working population in formal employment. This implies that social protection coverage has also remained narrow in most African countries, with about 90 per cent of the working population not covered by social protection programmes. We appreciate that social dialogue should be the means to achieving social protection. The Committee on Social Dialogue helped to put into perspective social dialogue in our different national setups. Without doubt, enhancing social dialogue in our different nations will help to consolidate our ideological approach to the concept of development and eventually ensure policy coherence at national level as we align our development policies to the Agenda 2030. Such social dialogue must be structured on the principle of tripartism, taking into account that employers' organizations, workers' organizations and government represent distinct constituencies and that, by nature of their existence, are directly involved at different levels in the world of work. Building up on the principle of social dialogue, we wish to congratulate the ILO for the initiative to engage the World Bank on its revised environmental and social safeguards to include provisions to respect labour standards in World Bank funded projects. In light of this, we appreciate the new approach by the World Bank and the International Labour Organization. The partnership of these two influential global institutions will help to enhance policy coherence at the national level in a number of ILO member States that undertake World Bank projects. The report of the Chairperson of the Governing Body also reminds us of the pledges we made at the IV Global Conference on the Sustained Eradication of Child Labour held in Argentina last year. We reaffirm our commitment to the elimination of child labour, and we offer our support to the proposal to encourage the General Assembly of the United Nations to declare the year 2021 as International Year for the Elimination of Child Labour. In conclusion, we wish to underscore the need for capacity building for workers' organizations, and indeed all ILO constituents, in order to achieve the strategic objective of the Decent Work Agenda. Chairperson, there is a need to take into account the paradigm shift in the approach to development cooperation in view of the ILO - World Bank partnership. This calls for redesigning Decent Work Country Programmes and realigning the dialogue structures in order to realize ILO's value addition at the country level and enhance social dialogue as a government instrument. Thank you.

Employer (Brazil)

Ladies and gentlemen, the National Confederation of Industries, on behalf of the Employers' delegation of Brazil, would like to extend its greetings to all those here present and thanks you for giving us this opportunity to express ourselves. The world and labour relations is going through a unique moment, and the objective to promote the environmental sustainability and the human relations, as well as the challenges which we must face given technological changes and because of migratory flows and globalization, are some of the reasons which society must make adjustments. And Brazil is a diverse country which aims to find solutions to the global challenges which involve structural matters as well as a demographic transition which is currently underway. The labour legislation is one of the matters which is being perfected in the country. Rigid labour law, which is made up of consolidated labour laws as well as a number of sparse regulations, was modernized for the first time in more than 70 years. We have more than 100 articles in legislation that have been updated, and we have modernized our protection measures for workers, and now we have an effective dialogue between workers and employers. Some of the positive results can already be seen, such as the reduction by around 5 per cent in the number of labour lawsuits and a huge number of collective bargaining agreements. For us to understand the reality on the ground, in February this year we signed around 18,000 new agreements. Specifically, this modernization, which has been democratically approved by the Brazilian legislator, has aimed to strengthen collective bargaining as well as in line with Conventions 98 and 154 of the ILO. Furthermore, strengthening collective bargaining has been protected by the Supreme Brazilian Constitutional Court. Ladies and gentlemen, I have emphasized the modernization of labour law in Brazil and this has gone a long way, a process that we have seen in a number of countries over the last 30 or 40 years. And we have implemented very late the transformations that have occurred in negotiation with workers. This process has given a greater space for being able to discuss issues regarding a collective regulation, and it has also decentralized the rules as well as creating some rules in the very place of work. We have a greater dialogue with social partners, and we have less interference from the Government, and this ensures that there is an agreement between workers and employers, and this stimulates voluntary negotiations. It is important to emphasize that this pillar of modernization has in no way meant the revoking of workers' protection. In truth, this change has established broad limits and guarantees which cannot be negotiated. These cannot be the subject of collective negotiation. For example, the protection of certain groups as well as the minimum wage, and we cannot negotiate the protections for health and safety at work. These are fundamental rights that cannot be negotiated on, and Brazil is ensuring that we modernize our labour legislation, and we support this change because we want to have a more appropriate context that creates jobs and increases the salaries as well as improving working conditions. For businesses it is unacceptable that Brazil is seen as falling short of its commitments in its labour relations. We have specialized legal frameworks for these negotiations, and labour justice costs 20 per cent of the budget of the Brazilian judiciary. We fall in line with and we have ratified 97 treaties of the ILO. Most developed countries have only ratified between 14 and 26 ILO Conventions. Currently, the largest economies of the world are reviewing their reform. Brazil must do the same. The modernization of the labour legislation gives us appropriate tools to rise to the current and future challenges which we will face, and it is from this point of view that the ILO must understand the Brazilian labour reform but it must also understand its institutional role as it analyses the different topics. As a custodian of the tripartite social dialogue, which aims to ensure that the relation between workers and employers is maintained, the ILO is the forum for political dialogue, and it is an important institution to analyse technical issues and to look at labour relations and employment relations. Thank you

World Federation of Trade Unions

Thank you, Madam Chair. Ladies and gentlemen, dear colleagues, on behalf of WFTU, we salute the plenary session, the delegates of Trade Union, the workers of all countries. From this podium we express our international solidarity with the people of Palestine who are suffering hard from the Israeli occupation. We condemn the new blood murder of unarmed Palestinian people in Gaza by the Israeli Army. We condemn the move of USA Embassy in Palestine, in Jerusalem. To us, Palestine and Jerusalem is the internally capital town of Palestine. At the international level, for one more year, the financial situation of workers and their life living conditions are very bad. In full mismatch of their life-giving contribution to the society. The austerity measures that were implemented in the name of the economic crisis have taken a permanent character in all countries of Europe and the western world in the form of pension, salary cuts, workers' rights withdrawal. The rivalries between the strong monopoly of different countries increasingly triggered in perilous intervention as the recent one in Syria, financial world sanctions that have a direct consequence to the life of ordinary people of those countries. The wars that took place in countries like Libya, Iraq, Afghanistan, Syria aim at the exploitation of those countries' natural resources by the strong capitalist country. Ladies and gentlemen, it is them who shed the peoples' blood and create entire enemies of unprotected people, refugees and immigrants. In the African countries, in many countries of Asia and Latin America, the workers are suffering the lack of dignified work. There's no health and safety measures in their workplace. There is no health coverage, drinking water, sufficient food, prevention of diseases like AIDS, etc. The unemployment and insecurity, especially in youth and women, denied their right to life with dignity. In this framework, the World Federation of Trade Unions supports the struggles and initiatives of workers who resist in France and India and shows its solidarity with sugar cane workers in Latin America, the teachers, everyone who is struggling in the corner of the planet. We stand side by side with people of Venezuela, Cuba and such people who fight against imperialists. During the 73 years from this establishment of WFTU, we dedicate its action to the defence of workers' rights, strengthening of class-orientated trade union movement at global level and to the practical expression of international solidarity. The observance of the international Conventions of ILO is important in ensuring the fundamental rights and trade union freedom of workers. But it is also needed that consistent vigilance and class struggling against monopoly and a devastating policy towards working class. We call upon the responsible people in ILO to take in account the longstanding WFTU demand for more democratic transparent operation of their institutions. WFTU firmly continues its support towards militant course, the organization of international level for present and the future of working class, for the stable work without imperialist wars, without xenophobic, without racist phenomena. We give our hand to every worker, regardless of his or her colour, religion, sex, language. Stand with us united and struggle against imperialist barbaric. We thank you.

Ms Farani Azevedo

Government (Brazil)

Thank you, Madam Vice-President. You, Madam Vice-President, ask the plenary to use parliamentary language. Workers from different countries who do not know what is going on in Brazil are passing judgement on issues that do not concern them. I wish that this kind of behaviour, a non-parliamentary language, could stop. I call on you, Madam Vice-President and the President of this Conference and other Vice-Presidents, as well as the Director-General of this organization, to put a stop to this kind of manifestation that is not in accordance with the best practices, the best parliamentary practices, of ILO and of any UN agency for that matter. Brazil does not acknowledge any misrepresentation of legitimate processes in Brazil. Over the last two years, Brazil has faced political crisis and economic recession. We have implemented important economic and labour reforms, enacted key legislation and promoted positive changes. Democracy is alive in our country. Civil society is vibrant. Political debate is in full force, and the rule of law is in place and strong, and the judiciary remains fully independent. We have not shied away from our responsibilities. We persevere in the struggle against corruption. In compliance with due process of law and respect for the individual guarantees enshrined in the Brazilian Constitution, our institutions have proven their strength. By our deeds and actions, the Government has demonstrated its unwavering commitment to the rule of law, and above all, to the open and democratic character of our society. I count on you, Madam Vice-President. Thank you.

Mr Drullet Pérez

Worker (Cuba)

Chair, as we move towards the centenary of the ILO, despite all the effort that has been put into the search for alternatives to improve the situation of workers in the world of work, we have to recognize that we are still far from achieving our goal. We could mention the many examples that demonstrate that violence is exercised against workers and that every year we discuss these cases in our search for social justice and for full respect for their rights and freedoms. As expressed in the Director-General's report, we have to promote equality of women in work and in society, and we have to turn reality around in this sense and fight for the fairness and justice that they deserve. Cuban women have already won many labour and social rights, which have led to their full empowerment in all areas of life. To illustrate these results, in Cuba, 49 per cent of the labour force is women, with equality of pay and rights, 53 per cent of Members of Parliament are women, 66 per cent of professional and technical professionals and 57 per cent of union leaders. And with these examples alone we can affirm that women's full rights are guaranteed, although we still continue to struggle to get rid of any remains of violence or discrimination that may come from individuals within society. Looking at the ILO's documents that have been published as a base for our discussions here, we can appreciate that the situation of millions of workers in the whole world is very difficult. In many European countries, workers are going through one of the worst nightmares of their history. Historic conquests have been done away with, their social and labour rights are being taken away from them, they're losing public services, pensions and are seeing their wages drop. In Asia and other regions, we can see more and more informal work in dreadful conditions without any protection, with awful wages and often in situations of semi slavery. In the Latin American context, social union and workers struggles against the neo-liberal policies applied by certain Governments are becoming more and more acute. Many of the advances that had been achieved in the project of integration and the creation of social programmes have been interrupted, provoking inequality, poverty, unemployment, discrimination and worse conditions of life. In a similar way, wars and inter-country conflicts have been a significant factor in the increase in unemployment, increase in migration, in the destruction of entire villages and of the environment, and it's women and children that are the victims most affected. Nonetheless, the global crisis that we're facing up to, along with the process of regression in many countries and all their consequences, are not just a temporary phenomenon. They are systemic, and therefore we reaffirm that it's the system that has to be changed. We are convinced that we will never resolve the serious problems of inequality, abuse, insecurity, unemployment, repression, war and crimes that we see at the moment being committed in the name of democracy and human rights within the existing capitalist system. Only with the necessary unity of the workers in the whole world will we be able to face up to this unjust system responsible for the difficulties of the world we live in. Chair, the Cubans continue to suffer economic difficulties as a result of the multiple crises that humanity is faced with and because of the measures imposed for many years by the unjust economic blockade, financial blockade and commercial blockade of the United States against Cuba, which has recently got worse. This attitude has contributed to the few advances that had been achieved in the reestablishment of bilateral relationships being undone, with the consequences that arise from that for the Cuban people and workers. Nonetheless, we are making the changes that we think are necessary, updating our social and economic model in order to improve our socialism. The Cuban Labour Code, which was discussed by more than 90 per cent of workers, takes in many of the protections that we are now analysing in committees here, and it's up to us to carry on working to defend the correct application of this labour legislation in its entirety. At the moment, the process of preparation for the 21st congress of our Central Labour Organization is underway, where the debate will be concentrated in the improvement of working conditions, occupational safety and health, the role of workers in the economic struggle, the improvement of our salary system, and of collective bargaining remits to carry on promoting development of our society to the benefit of workers and their families. We the people, and the workers of Cuba, through this process, guarantee the continuity of our system and the protection of labour union and social rights that were achieved in the revolution. We hope that with the contribution of everyone, and particularly of the Government, the seven initiatives of the 17 objectives for ... will be achieved. Thank you very much.

Mr Echavarria

Employer (Colombia)

We employers continue to contribute to the path of progress that we have been going down over the past few years, dedicated to including women in a situation of equality in the world of work, whether serving the state as business people or as workers. We don't agree with the general negative tendency of the way the Director-General's report is presented, looking at injustice in work rather than in progress. Other international organizations have picked out specific advantages. For example, UN Women in 2017 report highlights the adaptation or amendment of 72 pieces of legislation of 61 states. The World Bank also indicates that there has been a significant increase of women participating in labour since 1990. It would have been desirable for the report to set out more examples of progress and good practice in other States that could have been used as reference points for States in their activities. Employers give great priority to the inclusion of women. We don't think that the solutions to full inclusion will be resolved via mere legalistic approach. Even less do we believe that the responsibilities of the State in this area can be transferred to businesses, as we have started to see in some kinds of legislation and its interpretation. The solution, above all, is in the authorities which have to do their part in an effective way to do away with structural, social, legal and especially cultural barriers. And for this reason, they should also make it possible for women to have access to training for the incorporation or appropriate qualification of women in the labour market. The employers emphasize the fact that the more active participation of women in the labour market should translate into better efficiency in the labour market, efficiency which will contribute to greater productivity and to better development through insertion of these economies in the global economy of markets. We also emphasize that, through our activities, there are a large number of women in work in a better situation who are working autonomously through teleworking, working at home with flexible working hours, flexible remuneration, and end up being able to make as much progress as women as men in their careers. And we invite governments and workers to achieve and to earn better results. We invest in women, and we also ask that there be trust and a commitment to them through their effort and improvement of the organization of businesses. Colombia has also progressed in issues of agenda. The inclusion of women in the labour market has led to a general increase in the rate of employment. Women today are treated equally and have more space to act in society and in business. We are aware that not all has been achieved. We also need to have cultural activities carried out which will completely include women in equality of conditions of treatment and in work. We don't need more rules or legislation for that. We need more collective consciousness of the changes in everyday activity in the behaviour of individuals as a society. We'd like to tell you at this conference that Colombian employers have had equal numbers of women involved for reasons of gender. We have the satisfaction also to have a businesswoman who is a member of the Andi Council on Peace and Resilience, which is going to be having its conference in the near future. I'd like to end in reciting the important message that is sent out by presence of the Colombian Head of State and the Government to close a dark page in our history and indicates our emergence as a mature society. We also have to be able to overcome difficulties and differences in work through more joint activity of social activism amongst each other with the authorities and vice versa. Colombia's going through a transition leading to full participation of everyone concerned. We have seen huge difficulties for the ILO in Colombia over the last 25 years as a result of intolerance and political violence, also through criminal actions from drug traffickers, which has also had an influence in different parts of society and in labour. Therefore we have to resolve our difference of opinion and legal controversies in a national ambit. Mutual respect is the basis of understanding, and therefore I invite the workers of our country to work with us, seeking joint solutions to the natural difficulties that we see arising in our relationships in the world of work. We hope and believe that what will come will be a better world.

Mr Samaraweera

Government (Sri Lanka)

Mr President, Director-General of the ILO, Honourable Ministers, Excellencies, delegates, ladies and gentlemen, it is a great pleasure for me to address this 107th Session of the International Labour Conference representing the Government of Sri Lanka. It is with great interest that we have noted the forward-looking proposals in the Report of the Director-General of the ILO titled The Women at Work: The push for equality, which is an important and integral part of the seven Centenary Initiatives launched by the ILO. Equality in the world of work and empowering women is a fundamental aspect and a clear goal stipulated in the 17 Sustainable Development Goals. We will not be able to realize inclusive and sustainable economic growth without properly addressing the inequalities in the world of work. Mr President, in my country, Sri Lanka, we are pleased to record very high standards and gender parity in several social indicators such as in health, education, etc. However, we need to make more efforts in improving the participation of women in the labour force. As in the case of many developing countries, there is a need to break gender stereotyping in certain jobs. The Government of Sri Lanka is taking a number of initiatives to address this constraint. With the implementation of National Decent Work Action Plan on par with the ILO principles, we have also made labour rights predicated priority area in our National Human Rights Action Plan 2017-2021, prepared through an inclusive and transparent consultation with all relevant stakeholders. It seeks to address several key areas of concern, including occupational safety, elimination of child labour, regulations in domestic worker sector, etc, with a view to bringing in qualitative improvement in the welfare of workers. Adhering to the principles of tripartism and social dialogue, Sri Lanka is now in the process of introducing a single employment law giving effect to the principle of non-discrimination based on gender and other forms of discrimination in the labour market. Also, bringing amendments to the current labour legislation to cover domestic workers in terms of wages, conditions of work and social security is also in progress. Mr President, it is this backdrop that Sri Lanka is pleased to engage in the initiatives related to Global March against child labour, particularly focusing on safety and health aspects of young employees. We have made remarkably strides in preventing child labour, and I am pleased to share with this august assembly that Sri Lanka is ready to offer its expertise in this area to support the endeavours of ILO. Also, Sri Lanka strongly believes that we must make the workplace an environment free of harassment, including in the domestic work sector. It is timely to have the initiative by the Governing Body including a standard setting item of violence and harassment against women and men in the world of work in the agenda of the 107th Session of the ILC. A balanced outcome that is firmly grounded on the Declaration of Philadelphia could make a tangible solution to the issues of violence and harassment in the workplace and could address the underlining causes of gender inequality. Sri Lanka is of the firm view that, in realizing the Decent Work Agenda, all these steps remain as strong building blocks to the labour architecture that promotes rights and standards in the world of work. I thank you.

Government (Trinidad and Tobago)

Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Mr President, President General, Excellencies, distinguished ladies and gentlemen, it gives me great pleasure to take the floor today and to bring warm greetings from the Government and from the people of Trinidad and Tobago. Indeed, we are grateful for the opportunity to be represented at the conference this year and to reinforce global support for the advancement of Decent Work outcomes and for the achievement of the 2030 Sustainable Development Agenda. Mr President, next year we will finally celebrate the ILO's 100th anniversary, in 2019, and indeed we are happy that the launch of the seven Centenary Initiatives has given constituents the opportunity to directly participate in shaping the way in which the ILO achieves its mandate in the future. We have noted that it is up to constituents to take proactive action at the national level and through their respective tripartite organizations as they engage in the implementation of these initiatives. I would like to commend the Director-General on such a comprehensive and insightful report on the situation of Women at Work. Particularly his emphasis on pushing for full gender equality should not be overlooked. It is clear that achieving gender equality in the world of work is not only a human rights issue but is imperative for sustainable development. It was no doubt in recognition of this that world leaders made the decision to place the achievement of gender equality and the empowerment of women and girls on the Sustainable Development Agenda. Mr President, given our recent reflections as ILO constituents on the changing nature of the world of work, and as we recognize the collective responsibility of government, workers and employers to mould its future, it is my view that the Report of the Director-General represents an opportunity to reflect on the situation of women in the world of work among the member States of the ILO. The onus will be on member States to accomplish the global economic empowerment of women. If we want to progress towards securing such a future, we must, among other things, address the underrepresentation of women in jobs with better pay, foster and support gender parity in leadership positions, confront all forms of violence and harassment in the workplace, uphold the principle of equal pay for equal work of equal value, as well as recognize and commit to the reduction of unpaid care work. Mr President, the ILO's continued efforts to lead its constituents in the achievement of decent work has no doubt left a mark on the Government of Trinidad and Tobago, which constitutes to commit to people-centred development and to the promotion of the Decent Work Agenda. I am pleased to take this opportunity to indicate that there are several accomplishments of our Government. For example, we have advanced the promotion of the rights and responsibilities of employees and employers through an integrated marketing and communication campaign using social and traditional media. We have conducted consultation with all the stakeholders, approximately 14, on various pieces of legislation. In fact, our Government is continuing its work on amending labour legislation in Trinidad and Tobago as we launch and commence implementation of the revised National Workplace Policy on HIV and AIDS for Trinidad and Tobago, developed and implemented campaigns aimed towards sensitization of the public on the rights of domestic workers, as well as on the prevention and elimination of child labour in Trinidad and Tobago. We also commenced development of national policies on the prevention and elimination of child labour and on labour migration in Trinidad and Tobago. It would be remiss of me not to thank the ILO Decent Work team and office for the Caribbean for its unwavering support of our country's Decent Work initiatives. As a small island development state, Trinidad and Tobago, along with others in the Caribbean, continues to face economic challenges. Labour market vulnerabilities unique to the region, such as high rates of emigration, job and skills mismatch, low levels of productivity, youth unemployment, along with a growing informal sector and resources constraints, whether they be financial or otherwise, often serve as obstacles to the achievement of the Decent Work Agenda. Indeed, they are hurdles which confront us all. Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

Worker (Philippines)

Thank you, Madam Chair. Mr President, distinguished men and women of this august assembly, friends, I am honoured to speak for and on behalf of the workers of the Philippines. We commend the reports of the Chair, as well as the Director-General, as comprehensive as well as informative. Last Friday, we recall Colombian President Juan Manuel Santos spoke before us. He said that peace is only possible through social justice. The 2016 Nobel Peace awardee for ending 50 years of armed conflict in his country added, and I quote, "Social justice is achieved with more jobs, less poverty and less inequality." On this view we are delighted to recall the concept of lasting peace flowing from social justice. Being committed to this concept in practice, the ILO received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1969 on the golden anniversary of the organization. In the Philippines we are in interesting times. We are starting the quest for lasting peace with the communist guerrillas and the Moro secessionist to end bloodletting, while at the same time facing extra-legal killings that happen almost every day in the streets. First, on the quest for peace and international cooperation, under employment and decent work for peace and resilience recommendation of 2017, we commend Norway's valuable role in the peace process in the Philippines. Through the initiative of the Government of the Kingdom of Norway, the Government of the Republic of the Philippines has recently reopened the peace talks with the communist led National Democratic Front and its armed wing the New People's Army, which had been waging war for the past 50 years, but the rebels and the Government cannot walk away from the negotiating table because Norway has consistently been there. On the other hand, Norway is also involved in the peace process as international observer in the monitoring team overseeing the implementation of the peace process between the Government and the Moro Islamic Liberation Front. We are urging the Honourable Secretary Silvestre Bello III, who is the head of Government Peace Panel, to involve trade unions and civil society groups in the peace process. Peace is too important to be left alone to the warring groups. Secondly, we are highly alarmed and seriously concerned with the ongoing killings in the streets, including helpless children. We respectfully urge the Government to make corrective measures, reform the police force and use surgical measures instead of tolerating or enticing indiscriminate killings in addressing the drug problems in the country. Thirdly, on labour is not commodity under the Philadelphia Declaration in 1944 to improve workers' lives, NAGKAISA, including FFW, SENTRO and TUCP linked with the Kilusang Mayo Uno and mounted an anti-abusive contractualization campaign to address precarious work, both in the Government and in the private sector. Further, as regards social dialogue, we urge the Government to review the tripartite representation of workers in decision and policy-making bodies. Lastly, on a positive note, we are elated and grateful to the Government for the recent ratification of the Philippines of ILO Convention 151 on labour relations in the public sector that will benefit 1.5 million employees of the Government. We thank also the Public Service International and its affiliates in the Philippines who mounted the ratification campaign. The challenge to the Government now is to enact laws to implement the Convention. Thank you for your attention.

Employer (Pakistan)

Honourable Chair, respected ladies and gentlemen, respected Director-General and from ILO and others, as President of Employers' Federation of Pakistan, as well as President of South Asian Forum of Employers, I bring to you warm and sincere greetings from Pakistan and from South Asia. During the last one year, Pakistan has gone a long way in demonstrating her undeterred resilience to the challenges of terrorism, ensuring peace and stability in the strife-driven regions and in mobilizing the drivers and enablers of change in country's socio-economic development and business sustainability. I take this opportunity to compliment the Director-General for presenting a comprehensive report on the results achieved by ILO in promoting social justice through decent work by focusing on ILO's performance in the biennium as measured by social activism, enabling outcomes and cost cutting policy drivers. I also pay tribute to the Director-General on his wisdom in launching the Women at Work Centenary Initiative as one of the seven initiatives through which the ILO will mark its first 100 years and prepare for the future. I sanguinely feel that the plenary debate on this report will add new momentum to the ILO's work for gender equality and will be a major contribution to what the Director-General terms a broader push for equality. The Director-General rightly points out in his report that, despite global growth gathering momentum, the increasing world unemployment, lack of social protection to teeming millions and insurmountable plight of child labour and forced labour, along with the 2030 UN Agenda of SDG Goals with focus on Decent Work, enable the ILO with encouraging and meaningful opportunities to enhance its influence in the national and international policy domains. The DG's report also enumerates the decent work results, adoption of Vientiane Declaration on transition from informal employment to formal employment towards decent work promotion in Asean, the adoption of the plan of action for cooperation on matters related to migration of the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation, holding of dialogue on Future of Work initiative and developments on new DWCPs that are major highlights of results achieved in Asian Pacific region, including the South Asian countries. My country, Pakistan, is among the developing countries in South Asia struggling to emerge from the cage of socio-economic regression and is moving towards building and strengthening our political, economic and social institutions. It is encouraging to find the ILO in its country office in Islamabad resolutely standing with the tripartite stakeholders in reaping the benefits of some of the major results highlighted by the DG. The DWCP has entered its third phase. Pakistan has successfully established National Business Council for Social Protection Floors with a long and imperative agenda of focused activities. For example, positive steps have been initiated to mobilize collective bargaining in agriculture. We have just concluded with ILO a two-year joint project promoting better jobs through socially responsible practices in sports good industries in Sialkot, which is the sports capital of the world. Social dialogue on the ILS, ILES, Better Jobs, ILO 100, 101 Future Work, etc, and implementing through public private partnership are the examples of some of our major initiatives. We have recently formed an economic council that launched the Economic Vision 2030 and also the national business agenda among parliamentarians. With the ILO's support, we have phenomenal success in social dialogue when it succeeded in bringing the tripartite constituents to reach a consensus on the labour policy of my provinces, outlining the future visions of labour legislation, employee welfare and sustainable development. Let me go fast because time is short. While we extend our full support to ILO and the efforts of the DG achieving the targeted results, we call upon him to seriously consider a proposal to formulate a social compact specially focused on the needs and challenges of the less developed and developing countries Asia. In the end, I remember that when I was young we used to hear about Unicef in our schools. Now, for me, ILO has become part of my life. I see ILO as the beacon of hope for the deprived, the disadvantaged and the demoralized. I see the ILO as the bulwark for tripartism, and I see ILO as the citadel of social activism. In conclusion, taking advantage of this august House, I want to send a humble and earnest plea to world leaders from all the global citizens, please give peace a chance. I thank you Chair, ladies and gentlemen.

Government (Belarus)

Distinguished President, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, first I should like to congratulate the President of the Conference on election to this very high, responsible post. I wish you every success in your work. I'd also like to thank the Director-General, Mr Ryder, for his very comprehensive report, which shows the problems facing women in the world of work. Unfortunately, as we approach the centenary, we still have to mention the gender inequality at the workplace, in justice, in wages, insufficient appreciation of the contribution of women to bringing up children and running the household. The Government of the Republic of Belarus welcomes the active position of the ILO to advance the principles of Decent Work in our world today. It is important that ILO is not only studying and identifying given problems, but it is also proposing ways and means of resolving them. The international community has before it the seven Centenary Initiatives, which include very important areas for activity of the organization to create a just future for all. Distinguished Madam President, a strong social policy should not be seen as an alternative to a policy of economic growth. On the contrary, these are two parts of one whole. This can be clearly seen because the ILO has included the Decent Work concept into the 2030 Sustainable Development Agenda. The Government of the Republic of Belarus fully endorses this approach. In the Republic, we attach great importance to ensuring that the results of economic development have a positive impact on the wellbeing of all our citizens. Therefore, many measures of our state policy are intended to create an approach of solidarity so that there is not too much injustice and inequality in our society. As a result, over recent years we only have a very low level of income inequality. The index of concentration of income, the Gini coefficient, is less than 0.028 per cent. The level of employment of women in Belarus has traditionally been high. In 2017, the total workers had a share of women of over 50 per cent. Today, Belarus has a developed system of state support. A central element of that system of support is the maternity benefit. This benefit is paid for three years from the birth of the child. It is 35 per cent of average wages in the Republic. When the second and subsequent children are born the benefit increases to 40 per cent, and when there is a disabled child it's 45 per cent of the average wage in the Republic. A strong social policy is ensured by a good economy. In recent years, Belarus has seen reforms geared to liberalize the economy and create a conducive business environment. At the same time, the objective of sustainable economic development has to be achieved whilst we see a reduction of the work age population. Therefore, the Government thinks it's very important to implement measures to increase the efficiency of the use of labour resources inter alia by increasing the quality of the workforce. It's also very important for us to address the match between qualifications and competencies and knowledge which are geared to the needs of the labour market. Next year is the centenary of the ILO, a key element of the session of the International Labour Conference, to be held in 2019, will be discussion of the report of the Global Commission on the Future of Work, which will be presenting its vision of work in the twenty-first century and will give recommendations on measures and policies, which will help us to build the future which we wish to live in. At the beginning of this year, there was a report of the commission based on the results of the dialogue on the Future of Work in more than 100 hundred countries in the world, and this is impressive in its vision. We are seeing the entire sphere of the world of work. What do we expect from the World Commission next year? First of all, we need an answer to the main question, what will happen to the concepts of industrial relations? One hundred years ago the International Labour Organization began to protect social justice worldwide through its main principle 'labour is not a commodity'. One hundred years later the tripartite constituents of ILO have to give clear answers as to how to preserve this approach today and in the future. Thank you.

Worker (Ethiopia)

Madam Chair, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, it gives me great pleasure to make a speech at this annual tripartite conference on behalf of the Ethiopian workers' community and as that of myself. As I said before, I repeat today that the experience here in Geneva has always been unique, wonderful and enjoyable for both newcomers and as veterans. In addition, it is my pleasure meeting and or hearing comrades from all corners of the globe and of forging new relationship and consolidating the existing ones, exchanging ideas with social partners and building common ground, debating and discussing issues of huge importance to the whole human being, and the list goes on. Madam Chair, distinguished delegates, in this dynamic world there are many problems to face and solve, so things are going to be hard hitting. In solidarity it could be possible to fight problems and struggles. As we experience it for long time, the wide range of very interesting issues related to labour relations is part of the day-to-day life for us. This conference is a vital instrument to make the labour relations and the working conditions more smooth and suitable for all. Madam Chair, distinguished delegates, I fully support the Director-General's report and the discussions going on which are expected to have an instrument on violence and harassment in the world of work. As we all are aware, women have many responsibilities as family leaders. Violence, harassment on women and the neglected fair representation of humans at the workplace are all indications of backwardness in the modern world of work. My organization is committed to creating a conducive working environment which is free from violence and harassment and to promote inclusiveness. After all, creating stable industrial peace and achieving the industrial transformation is impossible without the full engagement of women. Today, some progress for women in the world of work has been made in terms of gender equality in society. In addition, more women than before are participating in the labour market. However, there is a lack of awareness that gender equality is of paramount importance in efforts to reduce poverty and therefore enhance economic development. The women are also more likely to be subjected to violence and harassment at work. Therefore, they are vulnerable to unfair and abusive treatments. Indeed, women and gender issues are not a recent concern, for the ILO has adopted different Conventions and a Recommendation to protect women's rights at the workplace. However, still today, the world of work is unfair to women, and there is no reason to expect that the future will be more conducive to them unless we take a necessary measure to eradicate gender-based violence and harassment from the world of work. Finally, I assure you that my organization strives for better working conditions of workers, particularly for the realization of eradicating gender-based violence and harassment for the world of work. I hope, in the coming centenary conference, ILO will equip itself with new instruments which ensure the future will be free of abuse of which women are primary victims, and I'm confident the challenge and the problems in this regard will get a solution. Thank you very much for your attention. God bless you all.

Mr Sosa Flores

Government (Paraguay)

Chair, ladies and gentlemen, we congratulate the President on his election, and we expect him to have every success in his activity. We'd also like to thank the Director-General of the ILO for the report presented to this conference on the subject of Women at Work, which is a basis for the discussions that are taking place in this high house. Paraguay shares the approach taken, and given that, allow me to indicate what we have been doing in favour of the promotion, protection and empowerment of women workers. The Paraguayan State, with the support of other social players, has implemented strategies with a view to, firstly, improving national indicators of participation of women in work. Secondly, increasing the productivity of women workers through new and better opportunities for formation and skills creation. Thirdly, an increase of the levels of formalization of work of women entrepreneurs, improving the status, then, of domestic work and the care economy. The state project of the Woman City in my country is a significant and symbolic step forward in the provision of services and facilities for women alone, with an integrated approach with a view to promoting the empowerment and the true autonomy of women through services for reproductive health, support for employment, professional training, in addition to advice, protection and assistance faced with any case of violence against women. And something that is not at all insignificant, all of these initiatives have been placed in the framework of social dialogue carried out by the Tripartite Committee for Equal Opportunities. And what I've been talking about translates as a political decision to work on the protection and promotion of women workers, which is not exhausted only by legislation but is strengthened by active policies which strengthen the autonomy of women in general and make it possible to reconcile working and family life. Paraguay has had significant experience as far as the generation and consolidation of a space of social dialogue is concerned, which has been institutionalized since 2014. The legislation that sets up the Ministry for Labour Employment and Social Security itself determines the functioning of consultative tripartite councils, and this body is in full operation and has had the job of dealing with conflicts of interest of different social players, addressing them in a democratic participative way and creating policies and creating consensus. Social dialogue has to be carried out on a permanent basis, and above all, it requires the commitment of those involved to construct modern democratic communities which can face up to the current challenges that we're facing with the continuous changes in the paradigms of co-organization of labour and society. We've learned the need to promote participation in a responsible way, for dialogue to substitute for confrontation where we see collaboration in a shared vision of a better future, to promote agreements in the present and not confrontation, which will stop us looking at the challenges of tomorrow, and it is important that the way that it is institutionalized is clear and inclusive. This is the philosophy that has guided structural reforms for the past five years, protecting the rights of workers. Prioritizing the creation of work is a key to promoting prosperity and to fight against poverty. As far as the Future of Work is concerned, Paraguay proposes that cooperation be strengthened between individual countries, addressing key issues such as social security and incorporation of technology, focusing on the jobs of the future without closing the path to artificial intelligence and robotics. For that, we need a lot of investment in human resources, in science, technology, engineering and mathematics. And going along with that, we should not fear the revision of the paradigms of labour relationships. To wind up, I'd like to thank the International Labour Organization for the continuous support that they have been giving us, and we hope that will continue. It's invaluable assistance to continue in our promotion of decent work of quality for our people. Thank you.

Worker (Palestine Liberation Movement)

In the name of God, most Gracious, most Merciful. Your Excellency Madam Chairperson, Your Excellency Director-General of ILO, greetings from Palestine and the workers of Palestine. In spite of the efforts of ILO to uphold social justice, the situation of our workers in the occupied Arab Palestinian territory is increasingly dire. In the intercessional period, we received an ILO mission, whose members listened to many heart-breaking testimonies linked to the latest developments of the situation of our workers who work in Israel and undergo different types and kinds of unofficial and official Israeli injustice and tyranny. These cruel practices run contrary to international labour standards and lead to stark violations of the workers' rights, ranging from denying them free and safe access to their workplace and humiliating inspection within border crossings, in addition to their pursuit and arrest and maybe murder. This made our workers vulnerable to brokers or middlemen who sell Israeli work permits. This is a criminal phenomenon that is due to a collusion with businessmen and security officers from Israel, and it is an unlawful practice that runs contrary to the agreements between the PLO, the Palestinian Liberation Organization, and Israel and the Paris Protocol, namely Article 37 of the Paris Protocol. Ladies and gentlemen, this is the environment in which unemployment is rife. Scores of the unemployed and an unemployment rate of 29 per cent, one of the highest in the world. In addition, there are growing poverty rates. The poverty rate in Palestine is 52 per cent. New pockets of poverty that are unprecedented in the modern history of Palestine have emerged. The local community gets a daily, grim reminder of the dismal social conditions in the form of more suicide rates of people who try to escape the hardships of life, and especially in the Gaza Strip. This means that the Palestinian labour market is ever more vulnerable and weak. Both the public and private sectors cannot create more job opportunities for young graduates, and this further exacerbates finding a solution to major problems, such as the exclusion of women from the Palestinian labour market and the empowerment of youth, whose unemployment rates reach 50 per cent and who are underrepresented in the labour market, in spite of their good qualifications. Palestine is ranked last amongst Arab countries in this field. Ladies and gentlemen, the Director-General came in a historic visit to Palestine in April of this year, in which he inaugurated the Palestinian Social Security Cooperation. A Memorandum of Understanding for the Decent Work Country Programme 2018-2022 was signed during this visit, which included cooperation mechanisms and also strengthening decent work in the National Policy Agenda 2018-2022, an increase of job opportunities, more governance of work based on fundamental rights and principles at work, which also guarantees freedom of association, collective bargaining and social dialogue, in addition to expanding social security. The Director-General saw with his own eyes touching scenes of the suffering of Palestinian workers and we are very grateful for his sincere compassion. There is no doubt that the report of the mission was satisfactory, but everyone knows that the Government of Israel, of the occupying power, does not care about UN reports or recommendations of specialized agencies. And I ask you, ladies and gentlemen, brothers and sisters, representatives of workers, employers and governments, until when are we to adopt reports that are merely shelved and put away? And I should like to appeal to you, on behalf of my workers, to condemn Israeli violence against Palestinian civilians who are expressing their demands peacefully, and to reaffirm the right of Palestinian people to protest and demonstrate and to claim their political rights, and to condemn the military occupation of the 1967 occupied Palestinian territory tomorrow, when they mark the anniversary of the occupation by Israel of Palestine. And we should reaffirm the right of the Palestinian people to establish their independent state with Jerusalem as its capital and to fulfil their self-determination right, and to call on all parties to uphold the international resolutions, namely 194, 383 and 242, and to condemn settlements that are built on occupied Palestinian territory, and to call on all countries to boycott these settlements on the 1967 occupied Palestinian territory. Thank you.

... opportunity to reconcile the professional and parental obligations. Employment creation remains crucial for the socio-economic development of Mauritius. We would like to see more support from ILO regarding the development of employment policies and that resources are committed for their implementation. We also believe that ILO should engage more with social partners in advocating for a conducive business environment, which is essential for the creation of decent and productive jobs. In the case of Mauritius, ILO can assist the tripartite constituents as we are currently designing our National Employment Policy and finalizing the Decent Work Country Programme. The recent visit of ILO Director for Africa has augured a promising era for effective cooperation based on our own context and developmental realities. Madam Chair, Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen, I thank you all for your kind attention.

Ms Sorensen

Government (Albania)

Dear Madam Chair, dear ladies and gentlemen, it is a great pleasure to address the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. Employment is one of the top priorities of the Albanian Government. There is no greater challenge than getting people into jobs. The past five years have witnessed a significant increase in the number of people participating in the labour market in Albania, an increase in the number of people employed across the country, and a decrease in the number of the unemployed. Yet some 670,000 Albanians of working age are not active in the labour market. Another 190,000 are still seeking employment, and many more are in search of better jobs. Ensuring equal access to economic opportunities for both men and women is not only a development objective but it is also about optimizing and maximizing economic growth. In view of an ageing population, utilizing the full potential of an educated labour force is a must to achieve higher economic growth and prosperity. Disparities in the labour market activity rate between men and women generate significant economic losses. A recent World Bank study estimated that the Western Balkan countries on average lose around 20 per cent of their GDP annually due to gender gaps in the labour market. In Albania, like in most countries in the Western Balkans, women are less likely to participate in the labour market. Over the past five years Albania has made significant progress in closing the gender divide in the labour market. Women's participation rates have risen from a low of 50 per cent in 2013 to 58 per cent in 2017. Nonetheless, the labour force participation of women remains significantly below European averages, with a considerable gender gap of nearly 18 percentage points. Like the labour force participation rate, the employment rate of women has been on a steady rise, from a low of just 40 per cent five years ago to nearly 51 per cent in 2017. Compared to men, the employment rate of women lags behind by nearly 14 points. In Albania, there is a significant need for rebalancing gender divisions of labour within the households. Today, 31 per cent of women are contributing family workers, compared to only 18 per cent of the men. A disproportionately larger share of women are unpaid family workers. In 2017, nearly 27 per cent of working women were engaged in unpaid family work, compared to only 15 per cent of the men. Addressing women's participation in the labour market requires a variety of approaches and policy measures, and more importantly, it requires interventions at various stages of life, starting as early as early childhood. At the end of January 2018, the Government of Albania committed to the development of an annual plan on jobs and growth, focusing on the role that all government ministries and all line agencies can play towards job creation. Over 200 measures have been identified for 2018 alone. More specifically, these measures relate to ensuring a conducive environment for job growth, an environment that attracts foreign investors and ensures and enables local companies to thrive and improve their access, not only to the regional market but also to the wider European markets. Secondly, the action plan and the measures look to facilitate the integration in the labour market of the most vulnerable groups, such as women, youth, people with disabilities, long term unemployed, Romani, Egyptian, etc, through the provisioning of quality employment services. Thirdly, equipping young people, and people of all ages, with the skills necessary for the jobs of today, and more importantly for the jobs of the future. Multiple measures have been planned to increase the labour force participation of women, such as active labour market policies that address the compounding difficulties that women face in the labour market, childcare support measures with a significant focus on the role that the private sector can play through corporate social responsibility, as well as supportive measures for maternity leave policies that promote the return of women back to the labour force. I would like to conclude by thanking the ILO not only for the organization of this conference, but more importantly, for all the support that it has and continues to provide in Albania in terms of the Decent Jobs Agenda. Thank you for your attention.

Mr Kärkkäinen

Employer (Finland)

Thank you, Madam Chair. Ladies and gentlemen, I am speaking on behalf of the Employers' Confederations of all the Nordic countries: Finland, Denmark, Iceland, Norway and Sweden. We would like to thank the Director-General for this year's report on The Women at Work Initiative. We note with delight that gender equality remains one of the priorities of the ILO. We, the Nordic employers, are fully committed to equal rights and equality of opportunities irrespective of gender. A diverse and gender-balanced labour market provides companies with the workforce they need to prosper. We know that talent and skills are gender neutral. As economies with relatively small populations, the Nordic countries learned from early on to tap into a labour market with a high rate of participation of both women and men. Over the years, this has led to a boost of economic growth in our countries. Indeed, the Nordic countries are often championed as leaders on gender equality. According to the OECD, in the Nordic countries almost three in every four working-aged women are in paid employment, and the gender employment gap is among the smallest in the world. However, this doesn't mean things couldn't be better. Let me focus on this with a few points. One of the challenges is how the remaining difference in the labour force participation rate for men and women can be evened out. The solution could be found in inclusive policies and right incentives. In the first place, childcare needs to be available at a reasonable cost. Also, family leave policies should be aimed at encouraging parents to share the responsibility of household work and caring for children. It should be noted though that more and longer family leaves are not an optimal solution. Long-time absence from work can undermine the employability of the person taking the leave. Employers can do their part too. Child-friendly policies at the workplace, flexible working time arrangements and the availability of part-time work make companies attractive employers for workers who have to juggle family responsibilities and work, but these kinds of responses have their limits. In the end, and to a large extent, the role of men and women in the working life is determined by the choices individuals and families make. These are influenced by the values that people have. It is obvious that an equal working life requires an equal life outside the workplace. We acknowledge that there exist disparities between the share of women and men working in different sectors. Of course, we all know that there are no men's jobs or women's jobs. However, traditional preconceptions are deeply seated. Men and women still make differing career and educational choices, which unfortunately are reflected in different outcomes in earnings and career development later in life. The Nordic employers take this issue very seriously. For example, initiatives have been launched in Norway and Finland to address gender imbalances, specifically in the technology sector. We also invite the ILO and its constituents to come up with proposals. Looking forward into the future, we hope that gender equality will not be viewed solely as a women's issue but a joint effort. In our countries, young women make up the clear majority in many fields of tertiary education and are growing into leadership roles. Quite often it's the young men who are being left to the margins without education and work. Nonetheless, we should not lose sight of the particular obstacles women are facing. To conclude, a labour market where the full potential of both women and men is allowed to flourish contributes to a sense of fairness, inclusiveness and trust, and these are qualities that are often seen as the strong points of our societies. We support the Director-General in his call for push for equality. Thank you.

Mr Mendoza Estrada

Worker (Guatemala)

Good afternoon, Chair. With your permission, I would like to start by expressing our great regret and our great solidarity faced with the problems that our brothers and sisters are having at home as a result of the eruption of the Volcán de Fuego near the capital city of Guatemala which has killed various people, injured many and caused a lot of damage and suffering. Mr President, the union organizations of Guatemala congratulate the Director-General for the report presented to this 107th Session of the International Labour Conference, and given that we entirely agree that the fight against violence and harassment of women and men in the world of work is an integral part of the fight for decent work and for social justice in the world. This conference had hardly got started, Mr President, when we got a message from our brothers and sisters in Guatemala informing us that a private company in the city was holding a worker against her wishes, with a view to trying to force her to leave the union. The case was properly reported to the competent authorities, but up until now we have not heard of any specific results of that to tell you about. Unfortunately, this is not an isolated case. The violence against workers in general, against women in particular, is a daily experience in our country. So for us the things that the Report of the Director-General picks out are extremely relevant for us and encourage us to take action with respect to them. Guatemala is a country that is characterised by violence. The conquest was violent. The colonial system that came afterwards was violent. In general, all of our history has been characterized by serious physical, economic and social violence. After the 40 years of internal conflict, with thousands and thousands of victims, the peace process sent a great hope for the men and women of Guatemala, but the truth is that we are still waiting to see how the deep causes of this internal violence can be done away with. The last years have not been encouraging. Guatemala is one of the few countries in the world in which, after the period of the Millennium Development Objectives, the official data indicated that we had gone backwards rather than advancing. Recently information from international organizations has told us that Guatemala is the country that has the worst working conditions in Latin America. Here in the ILO, the complaint presented by workers from Guatemala and other parts of the world is still under investigation, which was motivated by the violence against workers, including nearly 90 unionists, men and women, assassinated in the last few years. In this situation, women are particularly badly affected. The differences in conditions of work, particularly in wages in the farming sector, as in other areas of the economy, for example, for women working in the informal economy, continue to be clear and worrying. And apart from that, there are well-known obstacles for women working, given that there is no adequate care system for those who are mothers, or for other reasons which, at the end of the day, create almost insuperable barriers to women. And in particular, indigenous women are affected by these. Apart from that, as I indicated in the story I told at the start of my contribution, women, even if they do manage to get work, are submitted to unacceptable situations of harassment and violence of various kinds. So the situation is urgent, and there is a need to act. The State has a great responsibility here, but at the moment has not faced up to its responsibility. Just to give one example, up until now it has been completely incomprehensible that Guatemala has still not ratified Convention 189, on domestic workers, of 2011. Although the convention has the support of the Tripartite Committee, and was presented to congress by the Minister for Labour, the Parliament has still not ratified it. And dispensable [vgr INAUDIBLE 4:51] as governors, business people and workers, we can design and implement a national policy which will aim to do away with all kinds of violence and harassment at work. And apart from that, we need a specific, real and evaluable policy which will make real steps forward so that decent work stops being an illusion and becomes a reality for men and women workers in Guatemala. We reaffirm our commitment to fighting for the eradication of child labour in Guatemala and everywhere else in the world. Thank you.

Government (Cambodia)

Madam Chair, Mr President, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen. It is my great honour to be present here at the 107th Session of the ILC. On behalf of the Government of Cambodia, and on my own behalf, I would like to congratulate Mr President of the Conference on your election which indeed testifies the confidence and trust we all have in you for your full capacity to efficiently undertake this position. I would like to concur with the statement made by Director-General's report concerning The Women at Work Initiative: The Push for Equality. The Government of the Kingdom of Cambodia has been implementing Rectangular Strategy Phase 3 for Growth, Employment, Equity and Efficiency, wherein promoting gender parity is incorporated as one of the goals. Several supporting national policies have been put in place, namely the Civil Service Policy, Industrial Development Policy, National Employment Policy, Labour Migration Policy, National Policy on Technical and Vocational Education and Training, and Social Protection Policy. Women protection presents itself in the Cambodian policies and legal frameworks, reflecting our commitment to give new attention to women at work and beyond. In addition, Cambodia has been paying due care to the worker, in particular woman worker. These are things from various meetings with workers since August 2017. Samdech Hun Sen, Prime Minister has given several recommendations, among which care and protection of women are included. From 2018, male and female workers are entitled to free of charge health care services under the health care scheme of the National Social Security Funds, NSSF. Female workers during their maternity leaves are entitled to pay as prescribed under Labour Law and benefit from the NSSF. Female workers also benefit from additional allowance from Samdech Prime Minister when they deliver a baby or babies. Moreover, Cambodia is officially implementing the fourth cycle of the Decent Work Country Programme 2016-2018 while implementing the National Employment Policy 2015-2025 to support national development priorities. In terms of law enforcement, the labour inspection is being reformed and strengthened under close cooperation with the Better Factories Cambodia, BFC. To enhance the efficiency of the law enforcement, aiming at improving worker conditions and workplace environment, the Government of the Kingdom of Cambodia has put its utmost effort towards gender parity and protection for women. We keep in mind that our achievement would not be possible if there is no support from the social partners and development partners, and in particular the technical assistance of the International Labour Organization. Therefore, I would like to take the opportunity to express my gratitude to all of them for their valuable support and advice. Cambodia believes that the proposed Women at Work Initiative will certainly contribute to our ultimate goal in promoting and protecting women in the world of work. Thank you, Madam Chair.

---

Employer (Paraguay)

Madam Chair, I would like to extend very warm greetings to the President of the 107th International Labour Conference and to the Director-General, and I would like to wish them every success. The Director-General's report addresses several issues and problems that women face at the workplace, and in a very detailed fashion it sets out the initiative relating to women in work. Despite the fact that over the last two decades considerable progress has been made in very many countries, we feel it is necessary to come up with new and innovative ideas in order to complement the political instruments that have already been designed to encourage equality but have been implemented to date without too much success. If we take a look at past methods, we realize that these have not been successful in overcoming the deep-rooted obstacles, structural obstacles which hinder the path of women towards equality. We face a major challenge when it comes to the future of work, and I think we are going to have to try and ensure that our new standards, the new initiatives, any new instruments, tools and guidance really bring about proper and effective change for a real participation of women on the labour market. All of us have a joint responsibility. We all have a role to play, whether we are talking about public institutions, the private sector through its employers' organizations, the workers' organizations and other stakeholders. Another issue which is up for discussion relates to violence and harassment at the workplace. There is a need to adopt new international standards in this area given that the concepts of violence and harassment at the workplace are not specifically mentioned in any international instrument but are only referred to in an oblique fashion. But when we come to discuss this matter we have to do so in a very balanced, serene fashion, in such a way that the standard that is adopted does not lead to the possibility for misinterpretations or problems which would impede ratification and application of the standard. The working group obviously owns the responsibility of achieving a balanced consensus and on real foundations, which would be to the benefit of tripartism, and that does not necessarily place the blame for some of the problems that exist on the sector of the employers, which, to a certain extent, has happened in the original text. We recognize the fact that the ILO has a very important role to play in any global efforts aiming to eradicate violence and harassment in the world of work. In my country, we are taking a look at a draft law aiming to bring about gender equality, and obviously certain aspects are addressed in this draft law, but we have to ensure that we don't end up with discriminatory provisions. Tripartism and social dialogue are absolutely essential, and any society that wishes to guarantee social peace needs these two fundamental elements, and in Paraguay we are convinced that the best way to approach social questions and labour questions is through tripartism and social dialogue. And we, in our Tripartite Advisory Council, have managed to arrive at consensus on important issues such as the minimum salary, minimum wage and the law which regulates pensions. The Federation for Manufacturing Industry and Trade, FEPRINCO, which I represent, has participated in a number of tripartite dialogues and also in work commissions, including the commission on fundamental rights at work and for the prevention of forced labour. I would like to stress also that there is technical cooperation, financial support which we receive in our employer group in my country from the International Organization of Employers. A lot of capacity building in tripartism is taking place in order to provide training on how to properly respect the Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO, and here we would like to express our gratitude for all the work that is being done by the regional IOE Office in Santiago, Chile. Finally, we would like to give our support to the reforms which are being carried out by our organization, such as promoting better work for inclusive growth, and we would also like to stress all the environmental issues, everything relating to youth employment, the inclusion of women in the world of work in equal conditions, the fight against inequality, and a sustainable development and social dialogue. Thank you very much.

Government (Niger)

Madam President, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen. It's both a pleasure and a privilege for me to address this distinguished assembly to make an input to this important discussion on the world of work. Madam President, as I begin my statement, on behalf of the delegation of Niger, and on my own behalf, I would like to extend our warm congratulations to you and the other members of the bureau thanks to your election, and commit support to you as you carry out your task. Madam President, the International Labour Organization, our shared organization, will soon be 100 years old. Over time it has travelled a lot, a long road, and has been able harmoniously to renew itself, evolve and adapt, and most importantly, thanks to its actions, the world of work has seen remarkable progress achieved. And yet issues such as unemployment, under employment, poverty, social inequality and precarity are still concerns worldwide. Given the relevance of the basic ideals, which were present when it was set up in 1919, as well as the values for peace and social justice which it reincarnates, this organization, more than ever before, faces the multiple challenges worldwide. Madam, the first time that the Centenary Initiative on the Future of Work was proposed to the constituents, my country, Niger, stressed that whereas the ideals of peace and social justice remain, the central target of the ILO's actions, major changes in the global economy and their effects on the world of work would require that we review the road we have travelled in order to better tackle the future. May I today say that the subjects dealt with by the various technical committees in this 107th Session are a source of further comfort to us. Yet again I would like to commend the Director-General on the initiative but also congratulate him on the efforts made to implement it, and for the quality of the report submitted to us. Madam President, ladies and gentlemen, as far as it is concerned, Niger is also continually seeking responses to the concerns of the world of work, particularly through the implementation of the second act of the renaissance programme adopted by the President of the Republic, and as reflected in our economic and social development plan for 2017-2021 and many other instruments. Thus, in the field of social protection, major efforts have been made. Particularly, we have seen the adoption of a law on the fundamental principles for social protection, and there are major areas of work, such as the development and adoption of texts to apply the law, the organization of a national dialogue to define the national basis for social protection and the process whereby we institutionalize universal healthcare. In the field of employment, there are major achievements, in particular in job creation. In fact 1,350,837 jobs were created between 2011 and 2017, well over the target of 350,000 which the Government set itself for that period. Other action is also underway, such as the preparation of a new employment policy and action plan, as well as the implementation of two major youth employment programmes. In the field of labour, we have seen the adoption of a national policy for safety and health at work, the revised list of job-related diseases, the launching of the process to formulate the Country Programme for the promotion of decent work for 2019-2021. In professional relations, social dialogue, one of the highlights of this 107th Session, will be strengthened by the completion very soon of the professional elections to be held in my country. This very morning in Niamey, the context of the implementation of the protocol under Convention 29, activities under Project Bridge were launched. And finally, in labour standards, I am pleased to note here that we have ratified all the fundamental conditions of the ILO. We have also ratified two governance Conventions, namely Convention 144 on tripartite consultation, and Convention 122 on employment policy, and very soon we will be ratifying Convention 183 on the protection of mothers. Madam President, to revert to the Report of the Director-General on Women at Work, whilst welcoming its inclusion on the agenda of this session, my delegation is also of the view that violence and abuse directed against women are endemic. Efforts have certainly been made worldwide to combat this phenomenon, but we would like to draw attention to the need to step up the means to combat it, adopting new innovative approaches in order to reduce the gap in decent work from that standpoint. Thus, in the run up to the first centenary of the ILO, we hope that guidance from the discussions on this subject will fit into this impetus. And finally, I would like to express my country's readiness to play its part in implementing this work. Long live international cooperation. Long live Niger. Thank you.

Worker (Cabo Verde)

Madam President, Excellences, delegates and observers, representatives of governments, labour organizations and employer organizations, ladies and gentlemen, before I say anything else, we would just like to say hello to everyone here and just say what a pleasure it is for us to be taking part in this very important conference, representing the very, very highest level of workers of Cabo Verde. Additionally, we would like to thank you for the opportunity that you have granted us to bring before this conference this communication, which will present the point of view of those that have sent us on this mission from our ten islands in the middle of the Atlantic. Well, the centenary of the establishment of the ILO is just around the corner. This very important organization is based upon tripartite practices, and here it is our job to take stock of the great achievements which have been made in the world of work and to what extent these have been defined by the policies which were set from the very outset by the organization's founders. Throughout time, despite the different social, economic situations that the world has gone through, the different politicalized situations, the ILO has made it possible to remain firm and to stay true to its principles. Thus, it has become the very symbol of persistence and the capacity to achieve. Much of this can be traced back to its democratic character, its reliance on justice and also its tripartite nature. Ladies and gentlemen, the future of work is something which is of concern to us all in the four corners of the world, and this conference is a challenge to us to reanalyse the tripartite role when it comes to combating violence in the workplace and harassment against workers, and also calls upon us to develop and strengthen social dialogue with an eye to trying to achieve the objectives of sustainable growth. Cabo Verde is a young country with a democracy that is working well, and a multifaceted society where our main wealth is that of our workforce. Today, we have been independent for 43 years, and the country is developing and has made great progress. Why? Because our people have worked hard, both our men and women who go to work each and every day and take up their jobs in the workplace. Decent work is not fully achieved in our country, not as we would like to see it as representatives of labour. When it comes to violence in the workplace, well, there is very, very little physical violence as such in our country. That said, we deem that violence just does not end with physical violence. No, harassment also is a form of violence. A lack of respect for the rights of workers is another form of violence too. That's why we call here for a general reflection on what we are to deem violence in the workplace. As far as we are concerned, we will do our part in our country, defending where necessary and needed those who have sent us here to speak on their behalf, the workers. We are pleased to say that in Cabo Verde labour issues are dealt with and discussed at the tripartite level. This has been the case since the 90s. That, despite the fact we have yet to ratify Convention 144 of the ILO. Social dialogue has reached a stage of development which is considerable in Cabo Verde. However, our fight continues, and of course we want to try and achieve as much as we can via collective bargaining agreements. Ladies and gentlemen, we have a mission in front of us to speak on behalf of the men and women who work in our country. They are the main actors for the development of any country. It's a noble mission, but it's a challenge nonetheless, but we will be persistent. We will be consistent and determined. Those will be the main arms that can be used against those who would base their actions in the area of violence. Thank you very much and good will to all.

Worker (Belgium)

President, ladies and gentlemen, this conference is taking place at the same time as we find ourselves in the final straights in the run up to the ILO centenary which will focus on the future of work. But what about the future of the ILO? Everybody congratulates themselves on the work that is being done by the ILO, and the words of praise will no doubt be repeated next year, but you can't make an omelette without breaking eggs. And are the member States going to continue to be willing to invest financially into the multilateral approach? Another equally important matter is the following. What is the position of the ILO within the multilateral framework, and in particular against the backdrop of the United Nations reform? At the time of taking a look at these questions, these issues, we are not at all reassured, quite the contrary. In fact, if you take a look at the proposals that are being submitted, they run the risk of questioning the position of our organization, whether we are talking about the position of the local and regional agencies of the United Nations, or when it comes to the integration of its action into some of the United Nations framework programmes for development, such as UNDAF. To date, our approach has always been to strengthen the position of our organization, and we are fully convinced that this also helps strengthen the position of the United Nations, which has always been a very weighted organization, especially faced with Bretton Woods, the World Trade Organization, and intergovernmental summits, and this is something I really feel that we have to reaffirm, given some of the serious challenges that we are facing at the moment. Firstly, there is a radical transformation of the world of work, given technological changes, so called disruptive evolutions, and then of course these are happening at the time same as environmental and demographic challenges, and a new area of tension between globalization and de-globalization, and those who contest the important role, the essential role the ILO has to play perhaps ought to think again. And secondly, we have the emergence of a wave of populism right around the world. One of the reasons or explanations given for this, to justify the phenomenon, is that the medium class is becoming ever more frustrated because of increasing pauperization and job insecurity, which are underpinning the world work at the moment, and also because they have the impression that the political and economic elite are ignoring them, purely and simply. So in the multinational context is there any other organization, other than our own, who can really give a true voice to the workers? Thirdly, we have the issue of inequality. The world over we are beginning to understand that the enormous concentration of income and wealth, and what goes hand in hand with this, so economic and political decision-making power, is having a very damaging effect for more than one reason. At the same time, we are realizing ever more just how important collective bargaining and social dialogue can be to help solve some of these problems. And who is better placed than the ILO to play the role of protector and incubator, given that their DNA is fundamentally made up of social dialogue, tripartism and collective bargaining? And fourthly, we have the 2030 Sustainable Development Goals, which obviously have very many goals aiming at sustainable development, and this is at the heart of the activity of our organization. And obviously it is a question of then trying to achieve these objectives in very close collaboration with the national authorities, regional authorities, social partners. And who can better guarantee the main role to be played here than the ILO? What we have to have is a specific implementation and objectives of Sustainable Development Goals. So we really have to try and sell these goals. We know that there is a lot of marketing, just as is the case for corporate social responsibility, but we have to do as much as possible in order to ensure that in 2030 we are not standing there empty handed, and we really have to urgently turn the SDGs into the three Rs: rights, rules and results. For the world of work, we have to have binding rights for workers, specific obligations, binding obligations for those who are there to guarantee these rights, and we have to try and achieve this by 2030. And who is better placed than the ILO in order to be the driving force for all of this? And whether we like it or not, the main activities of our organization consist in defining the binding standards, together with sanction mechanisms. As a result, I call upon you not to, through a not well thought out reform of the United Nations, deprive the ILO of its specific nature, its autonomy, and consequently its strength. This strength comes from its tripartism, ongoing dialogue with the outside world, the world of work and the world of ordinary citizens. Thank you.

Government (Thailand)

Madam President, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen. On behalf of the Royal Thai Government, it is my honour to attend this important international conference. To begin, I wish to commend the Director-General, on your great effort to drive forward the issue of gender equality in the world of work. I am glad to learn that the ILO and the member States are developing instruments that help give systematic guidelines and inspirations for more effectively legal frameworks to deal with violence and harassment in the world of work, which has blocked career pursuit for women. The Royal Thai Government has committed to promote gender equality by integrating it in all areas of the national developments. Policies, measures and mechanisms have been put in place to empower women's developments, promote equality and protect women's lives rights, as seen in: our Constitution and the five-year 12th National Economic and Social Development Plan 2017-2021; our Gender Equality Act 2015 and Strategy for Women's Development 2015-2021, big steps in promoting women's status, protecting labour rights and equality; our current National Policy 'Thailand 4.0' to restructure the country into an innovation-driven society and leave no one behind on its path to become a high-income country. At international level, we are party to international agreements on women's empowerment and gender equality. Actually, we reaffirmed Convention 111 last year. The socio-economic status of Thai women has overall improved greatly. Women are on the rise to hold executive positions in government and private sectors. However, much is still needed to be done. And we are working hard on it, especially to improve the situation of those in the informal sector and migrant workers. In this end, Thailand reaffirms our commitment to cooperate with ILO and all stakeholders, nationally and internationally, and for the successful promotion of gender equality, decent work and pave ways towards the future that works for all. Thank you.

Mr Toure

Government (Côte d'Ivoire)

Madam President, as I start my statement on behalf of His Excellency Alassane Ouattara, President of the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, I wish to commend the action of Mr Guy Ryder, the Director-General, and the commitment of his team to allow Africa to succeed in their major wager to make sure that we can transit towards a favourable, macroeconomic climate for decent work, particularly for young people. Through the tripartite approach in this important institution, we see its extraordinary ability to bring together all the components of the world of work, from all walks of life, to be a real forum for give and take on major issues relating to international standards, the development of policies and programmes to promote decent work for all men and women worldwide. Ladies and gentlemen, decent work inter alia means that workers can choose where they work with a decent wage, without consideration of gender issues, and this is why the report The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality is, we feel, a true lodestone and encyclopaedia which makes it possible to understand, or at least to begin to see the emergence of ways to understand the inequalities at work between men and women, which mean that we can't always talk about decent work for women at the moment. The report is a very dense one and deserves a more in-depth analysis to go beyond the laws, policies and statements of intent which established theoretical equality between men and women in work, whereas the true situation is quite different. As the report stresses itself, the situation of women has hardly changed over the last 15 years, despite developments in laws and policies. For African countries, particularly for mine, there will be no economic development without better productivity, but there will be no better productivity without decent jobs and better social protection for one and all without distinction on the basis of gender. And as I said before, and has been recognised in the report, The Women at Work Initiative, with the action of bodies such as the ILO, pressure groups and feminist activists, many countries have made true progress in ensuring respect for and protection of women's rights. My country has not lagged behind in making changes in the laws to create a favourable environment for equality at work between men and women. Our constitution, the basic law of our country, is a true illustration of this desire to ensure that women have the same labour rights as men. I can quote Article 14 which says that, "Access to public or private employment is equal for all based on their qualities and skills and abilities." We prohibit any discrimination in access to jobs and in their exercise, whether that be based on gender, ethnic origin or political, religious or philosophical opinions. But as the report stresses, the relationship between growth and economic change on the one hand, and education and women's participation in the labour market on the other hand, is not as simple as you might think. Growth and improvements in living standards alone will not get rid of inequality between men and women at work. That is why His Excellency the President of the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire has established, as a national priority, the issue of promoting decent work for all young people, boys and girls, focusing on young women, in order to help them to have access to jobs, a vocation and to income. This obviously will be the cornerstone for social and political stability, the essential condition to ensure that we reach 2020 with a firm future ahead of our country. I would like to end by commending the Director-General and his team for this excellent report, which we intend to use as a compass to guide us throughout our future activities to promote decent work. And it is with these words that I would bring an end to this statement whilst thanking you for your kind attention.

Ms Kidd

Government (Australia)

... government values its close engagement with the ILO and appreciates the opportunity to address the ILC plenary. In doing so I would like to acknowledge the work of the ILO's Director-General, Mr Guy Ryder, to progress the seven Centenary Initiatives. Australia particularly welcomes this year's plenary theme, which is another important opportunity for member States to engage with the Women at Work Centenary Initiative. While progress has been made, more needs to be done to reach

SDG 5 of gender equality, and we look to the ILO to show strong leadership on this critical issue. The Australian Government is a strong supporter of the Women at Work Centenary Initiative. We were proud to sponsor the ILO's regional conference on Women and the Future of Work in Asia and the Pacific earlier this year. The conference brought together tripartite representatives from across the region to examine the opportunities and challenges faced by women at work, and generate evidence based policy recommendations to inform our response. For example, in line with the Director-General's Women at Work report, the conversation noted the importance of flexible work arrangements and non-standard forms of work to give women more options for balancing their work and care responsibilities. This conference will also inform the Asia Pacific region's contribution to the Future of Work and Women at Work Initiatives before the ILO's centenary next year. Given the increasing importance of this work for the ILO, it is critical that we all walk the talk on gender equality. We welcome the progress made at the 332nd Governing Body in March, where it was agreed that the ILO would report on those delegations that meet the long-standing minimum target of 30 per cent participation by women. It was also agreed that all groups would aspire to achieve gender parity in their delegations to ILC and regional meetings. This is an important step forward, and we urge all tripartite members to consider it seriously. We look forward to the Director-General's report on the representation of women in delegations at this ILC. Australia recognizes the Director-General's role as an international gender champion and his personal commitments in this regard. We consider measures such as the gender champions to be valuable in demonstrating leadership at the highest levels. But with such commitment comes responsibility, and we are pleased to see it followed through in a number of areas. For example, we acknowledge, and strongly support, the ILO's internal campaign to raise awareness of sexual harassment, to create a safer workplace, a key commitment of Mr Ryder as a gender champion. Another core commitment of international gender champions is the Panel Parity Pledge, where supporters take responsibility for ensuring gender balance on panels. This is an area where more needs to be done. Recently, we have seen unsatisfactory gender imbalance on ILO panels, including panels associated with the Future of Work. How could we possibly consider the future of work without half of the population adequately represented in the conversation? The visual signals associated with male-only or male-dominated panels are very powerful, and we urge the ILO to do better in this regard. We strongly encourage Mr Ryder to lead by example on this, not only on the panels he is invited to, or involved in, but for all panels run by the ILO. Finally, while the Women at Work report delivers some commitments, it was disappointing to see the lack of detail put forward to progress gender equality across the proposed five building blocks under this new push, especially given the report's admission that the ILO has so far failed to produce its desired results for women. While Australia can see the value in the ILO engaging more deeply across these five areas, we need the ILO to propose a more comprehensive package of concrete actions, that goes beyond standard setting and conversation, to address them. In his report, the Director-General reminded us that we need to supplement the tried-and-tested gender policies with new and innovative approaches to overcome the deeply entrenched structural obstacles to equality. We also need to collectively take responsibility for ensuring that women across the world are equipped to thrive, not just survive, in the future of work. Australia encourages all member States to actively engage on this initiative and support the ILO's efforts to mainstream gender into its operations. We look to the ILO to be a leader within the UN on gender equality. In this light, we strongly

Worker (Italy)

Chair Person, distinguished delegates, as we are approaching to the ILO centenary we need to strongly reaffirm the pivotal role of the difficulties of work and social justice for peace and development for society for all, in the light of the future of work we would like to envisage. As pointed out by this here DG report, the new push for gender equality requires strong commitments of all. Therefore, we appreciate the launching of Women at Work central initiative among the several established. As highlighted in the DG report, there has been little change in outcomes for women on the ground despite advances in laws and policies, and despite the fact that women and gender issues were two of the first three Conventions of the ILO, that's numbers 1 and 3. Today, fundamental human and labour rights are still denied in many parts of the world. Safety, respect and dignity for all, calls for a strong engagement of the ILO constituents. Thus, we highly appreciate the task of the conference of negotiating the needs of international standards of fighting against violence and harassment at work. Many results were achieved but a lot more needs to be done, and the ILO has remained vigilant about this, especially committing to increase the number of standards of ratification, which are essentially pillars of the normative system and the lifeblood of global democracy, and look after the implementation carefully. Their monitoring must be assured by a strict independent and autonomous robust system of supervision and control. We therefore reaffirm the importance of the ILO supervisor system and the need to safeguard the mandate and function of the Committee of Experts, which has ensured effectiveness and respect of fundamental rights in law and practice. The ILO is crucial in ensuring policy coherence and application of standards to reach the goals we have ahead. Tripartite, with the added value of the ILO, shows that social dialogue, the involvement of social partners and collective bargaining at those levels, are the best tool to achieve social justice, and the ILO consideration can ensure constructive changes to provide the just transition towards sustainable economies and societies for all. We acknowledge that no one size fits all, but policies and programmes need to be arranged in line with the specific condition of countries, respecting the rights of all, with special regards to disadvantaged groups. And this has to be done using social dialogue, an instrument adapted to [vgr INAUDIBLE 2:24] which should place, reinforcing collective responsibilities. In an era where multilateralism is being accused of being inefficient, development cooperation plays a crucial role in instructing dialogue and collaboration. The 2030 Agenda is equally right-based and focused on leaving no one behind. The SDGs, and in particular the 14 indicators of which the ILO is the custodian or partner agency, requires strong commitment by all. The four pillars of the Decent Work Agenda are key drivers for achieving the SDGs. We need to reaffirm the importance of quality job, social justice and fight poverty as key drivers for peace, growth and social cohesion. Within the context of the UN reform, and delivering as one on Decent Work outcomes, the ILO has to ensure the SDG 8, decent work, being one of the cornerstones of the future strategies of the United Nations Development Framework assistance. Decent Work Country Programmes should be included in the common country analysis to be sure of prioritizing the key elements to achieve inclusive and prosperous societies. Re-convergence among the parties involved is therefore needed. In this regard, we consider that the International Training Centre of Turin can play a pivotal role, providing learning, training of research in all areas of significant importance, following the rights-based approach essential for implementing the agenda of just and equitable transition. North-South cooperation remains fundamental, but we acknowledge the growing importance of the South-South triangular cooperation in the light of mutual benefits for all. To ensure this, we would need to stress the importance of the four strategy components of the development cooperation strategy: focus, effectiveness, capacity building and resource mobilization. Regarding the last point, we strongly urge to increase the financing for development with a focus on decent work. Official development assistance, or the [vgr INAUDIBLE 4:27], should play a crucial role in this, but it's not enough. The 2030 Agenda recognized the increasingly important role played by the private sector and international corporations, hence the respectful and international labour rights, especially for the ILO core convention, calls for an inclusive labour market capable of matching enterprises' performance with labour and social protection as precondition of fair approach. Monitoring and evaluating partner assessment of public private partnership are fundamental for ensuring democratic ownership, inclusiveness and accountability, safeguarding the commitment of leaving no one behind. The Italian trade unions have been committed to this, to the principle of leaving no one behind, both financially and internationally, also to establish development cooperation institutes that have been working worldwide. We therefore confirm our full commitment to contribute to the achievement of the ILO goals within and with the ILO for a society for all, leaving no one behind. Thank you.

Worker (Indonesia)

Excellences, Mr Chair, ladies and gentlemen, I am Ristadi from Indonesian Workers' Delegation for National Trade Union Confederation or KSBNI. In this ILO 107, I represent all confederation of all trade unions in Indonesia, who also are members of National Tripartite Worker Delegation of Indonesia and Confederation. They are KSPSI, KSBSI, KSPI and Sarbumusi. Mr Chair, first of all we want to clarify that liberalization of labour market to some extent has created problem with foreign migrant workers who are entering a country without the proper document. This also happens in Indonesia. Therefore, we remind our Government to consistently implement the rules in accepting foreign workers and crack down on anyone who is illegal. We also ask our Government to give priority to Indonesian worker because there are many people of Indonesia who are unemployed. That is our statement. So it is not true if trade union of Indonesia refuses foreign workers or foreign investment. We certainly understand that every country is issuing policies that prioritize the interest of the State and its people, and of course we all know that this country must ask the foreigners who come to obey the rules of the country, including Indonesia. Therefore, please come to Indonesia, we welcome with good but obey our country rule. Mr Chair, after reading the report of our ILO Director-General, I agree in every sense with the ILO's commitment to equality for all. Indonesia also has a strong commitment to equality, by ratifying ILO 111 Convention, signed 1999. Equality in eastern countries is still in the process of habituation. Whatever the system of government, the cultural values of eastern still have influence to our life, although not so dominant in Indonesian people. But this is still one of our challenges. Equality is not just about comparison of numbers but about access, participation, involvement with decision-making process or control and benefits. Protective and affirmative action strategies, such ILO advice, should continue to be encouraged to eliminate discrimination. Technical programme support from the ILO, of course we do hope to continue to promote equality in Indonesia. Mr Chair, besides equality, the commitment to stop violence and harassment in the world of work is important part of our struggle for decent work, decent wage and decent living, one of them through strategies for strengthening social dialogue. The development of industrial world and labour world of one country related to other countries, therefore there must be a shared commitment and solidarity in the face of the development of the global situation. Ladies and gentlemen, finally therefore, we invite all trade unions in the world to maintain solidarity, manifest decent work, decent wage and decent living for all. Thanks very much for your kind attention.

Mr Awan

Worker (Pakistan)

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, ladies and gentlemen. First of all, like the Chair, I must appreciate the Director-General's report, and thereafter the report of the President of the Governing Body of the ILO, in which they have taken this initiative of introducing it on gender, and relatively with that of what so far achievement we have in the past and that we work in the future of this organization, because this organization is the only one forum for where the workers do have device to sit with equal footing with employers and their governments. The present debate on the violence and harassment in the world of work are, in our view, very close connected and difficult to separate and constitute if serious human and labour rights violation. However, there is a strong gender dimension with women increasingly paying the price of their enhanced role, for in the world of work and at society large by being confronted with violence and harassment and including thereafter sexual harassment. This impinges also on the ability to exercise other fundamental labour rights and is incompatible with decent work. It poses a threat to the dignity, security, health and well-being of everyone, and there is an impact not only on workers and employers, but also on their families, communities, economies and society as a whole. Chair, the recurrent discussion on social dialogue provides an opportunity to reaffirm the relevance of social dialogue with freedom of association, and collective bargaining is enabling rights that promote social justice and decent work. This discussion is quite timely. Inequality at a stark level and share of the wages as percentage of GDP has declined significantly in recent years. The ILO instrument, and that of the Conventions, particularly the Convention 87 and 98, which gives workers the right to unionize and bargain collectively, remain the least ratified of the core Convention, even though all of the constituents of this house have undertaken to achieve their universal ratification by 2019. But even when these Conventions have been ratified, too many countries' laws and practice include serious obstacles to workers' effort to organize and strike collectively for better wages, working conditions and decent work. Chair, on the matter of the general discussion on effective development cooperation in support of Sustainable Development Goals, international development cooperation is undergoing profound changes marked by the new finance for development framework and the UN reform processes. The ILO is the oldest United Nation agency. Its existence predates that of the United Nations itself. We will celebrate its centenary next year, when we will discuss the role of the ILO in the future of work. The workers want to ensure that the action taken with a view to strengthening the United Nation's system will help to further strengthen rather than weaken the ILO role and mandate. The ILO has a unique place in the United Nations structure that must be maintained, and can provide inspiration and guidance throughout the United Nations system. Chair, let us also thank the Director-General for his report on the situation of workers of occupied Arab territories. The occupation, now already 50 years on, continues to make the living and working conditions of workers of Palestine extremely difficult without real proposal for improvement. Unemployment has reached record levels, with youth and women the hardest hit. Renewed effort must be made in order to bring the occupation to an end, with an establishment of an independent and viable Palestine state, living side by side in Israel in peace and security, where then workers do have the right to attend their ultimate objective of better living and working conditions for the future. Thank you, Chair.

Worker (Sudan)

In the name of God the Merciful, the Compassionate, Mr Chairman of the Conference, Mr Chairman of the Board of ILO, Mr Director-General of ILO, ladies and gentlemen, dear participants. May the peace of God be upon you. Greetings to all of you. I would like to salute this huge organization for persevering in achieving its objectives. We are attending the 107th ILC, and it is a clear determination that the organization is going on, and it has achieved a lot. I would like to greet all the people in charge and the officers of the conference, and I wish you well for all the rest ahead of you. I would like to express our support also for all the actions undertaken in favour of workers. Ladies and gentlemen, the report of the Director-General was exhaustive and very thorough, and it has tackled all the problems that we are facing with workers in a very exhaustive manner. The ILC meetings and the committees were responsible and undertook the task that they were assigned with. We, representatives of the Sudanese workers can't but support this direction and salute also all the great achievements. I would like to note also that the Sudanese Labour Union had tackled all these issues that we set ahead of us in order to find the good, efficient mechanism such as social dialogue. Ladies and gentlemen, dear participants, Sudan is amongst the countries that is very much interested in ratifying the Conventions relating to decent work and we support decent work. I would like to say also that the Sudanese Labour Union is playing its role in providing human services for the workers. It supports them and it protects their rights and their assets. We take this into account in all what is compatible with the Sustainable Development Goals. Ladies and gentlemen, dear participants, we, the Sudanese Labour Union, are participating here, and we request the organization and all the relevant actors to suspend the siege under which Sudan is finding itself, because this is affecting badly workers who cannot actually go to work and earn their living. We should not run away from this. We cannot run away from this. The only leeway that is left to us is to run away and escape and try to migrate. It is very important. This is a very important obstacle facing the whole society. Ladies and gentlemen, Sudan, despite all the pressures, all the catastrophes and all the crises, is still striving to extend all the givens of peace, and it has played a very big role. The Government has played an important role in that regard in order to guarantee a national dialogue. I hope that this conference will adopt recommendations that will serve the best interests of workers and it will extend decent work in all societies and that we are all striving at. In conclusion, on behalf of the Sudanese Labour Union, we would like to express our condemnation of the transfer of the American Embassy to Jerusalem, and we hope that Jerusalem will be the eternal capital for Palestine. We condemn highly this transfer of the embassy. Thank you, Mr Chairman, for your attention.

Mr Mohbaliyev

Worker (Azerbaijan)

Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of the Confederation of Azerbaijani Unions, and on my own behalf, I extend greetings to you and wish this session successful work. I would also like to thank the distinguished Director-General of the ILO, Mr Gary Ryder, for his recent visit. This meeting was a historic and significant one. The comprehensive dialogue held with Mr Ryder, the exchange of views on the current and future development of the countries of our region will, I do hope, bear excellent fruit. Ladies and gentlemen, I believe that the agenda for this 107th Session includes such topical issues which require that we, the social partners, pay even greater attention and activity to resolve. We know that globalization is an irreversible trend in today's world. Its course and results, to one extent or another, have an influence on the living standards of millions of people. At the basis of globalization we will find a freer movement of capital, goods, services, technologies, information and the labour force, and thus the economies of developed and developing countries are losing their national isolated nature and becoming a part of the global system. Unfortunately globalization also gives rise to negative problems for people, such as the uncontrolled movement of human resources, the uncontrolled growth in the population, the breakdown in the environment, social inequalities, famine, an increase in social injustice, a lack of natural and energy resources. Ladies and gentlemen, in each country the wellbeing of people depends on the social makeup of society, and this is the main indicator to the social development of any given society. For successful social development in society, at the national and international levels, we need to bring to life the relevant social policies. Our unions at home firmly stand for a fair globalization. We are trying to ensure that the whole population, including women and young people, have full, valuable jobs, decent, just, well-organised labour, meeting the domestic strategy for development. Our unions have mobilized within their mandate. They mobilized their efforts both nationally and internationally to achieve the tasks contained in the initiative of the ILO for future social justice. Distinguished participants, a great influence on our activities in this area has been seen in the creation and the beginning of activities of the National Trilateral Commission on Social and Economic Issues. In Azerbaijan, we are seeing significant changes in socio-economic development. The wide-scale reforms conducted, measures to implement the strategy for decent work are one of the conditions for enhancing the wellbeing of the population. Successful implementation recently in our country of the National Programme for Decent Work has made it possible to ratify two ILO Conventions and to prepare the National Plan for Youth Employment. In the last decade, we have achieved rapid development. We have become a country for above-average income. In order to enhance the social protection of our workers, to improve labour relations between employers and workers, by Presidential decree, we saw the establishment of a republican commission to regulate and coordinate labour relations, bringing together representatives of the three sides of the social partnership and various state structures as well. Today, this commission is operating successfully. Distinguished participants, we are living in a world where multinational capital is turning into a major employer. However, there are specific relations with the labour market for this capital, and there are problems with social justice. As distinct from the national employers, multinational capitals have no such obligations. The unions of the world are trying to build a social dialogue at the global level with the transnationals. The International Labour Organization, informing its policy at the global labour market, cannot evade the challenges facing the unions. For many years this issue has been coming up, and it is our hope that this time round the problem will draw the necessary level of attention in one of the centenary dialogues and become a subject of discussion. In conclusion, yet again may I assure you that we remain true to the principles of tripartism, social dialogue and social justice. Our confederation supports the policy to modernize the International Labour Organization. Thank you very much for your attention.

Mr Adikari Appuhamilage

Worker (Sri Lanka)

... this conference, in the crucial period of the workers, not only in Sri Lanka but also in the world. There were several trade union actions during last week also in Sri Lanka. Workers of the Water Board went for trade union action, demanding the salary increment as previously promised. Engineers in Sri Lanka Electricity Board started a Work to Rule action, and Sri Lanka railway workers started another trade union action on their demands. From January 2016, the public sector workers were deprived the prevalent pension system and a contributory pension scheme was introduced. The recruitment on fixed-term contracts significantly violates the workers' rights, including the rights to organization. Recruitments via third party, agents and outsourcing also have contributed to the real employer to avoid all the legal obligations to the workers. The recruitment via a third party is one of the brutal methods of exploitation, and unfortunately the previous and present Governments have been promoting this system in public and private sectors. Mr President, according to the National Minimum Wage of Workers Act number 3 of 2016, the national minimum monthly wage is 10,000 rupees (INR). INR10,000 is equal to $63. Therefore, the National Minimum Wage Act becomes meaningless. The Act does not provide the required meaning to make a sustainable living. The Government and the employers together have been ascribing to introduce labour law reforms. The Government and the employers want more flexible labour market system. The eight-hour working day is threatened and nine-hour working day is likely to be introduced. There are proposals to recognize the Workers' Council and trade unions as equal institutions. The Workers' Council are totally in the hands of employers, and they are controlled by the employers. The largest social security fund, Employees Provident Fund, is facing a serious threat because of the mismanagement of the fund. The fund lost INR10 billion in the famous bond swindle in the year 2015. Mr President, the tea and rubber planters and sector workers are paid about only $4.50 per day, and in some smallholdings the workers are paid even lower salaries. The workers of the world are not having basic material needs, despite the fact that they produce everything. They produce countless tonnes of food item every day, but in hunger. Though the mining workers work hundreds of metres below the earth in mining the most precious minerals, they hardly get sufficiency of the produce. They die due to cold and heat, despite that they produce electricity, stoves and air condition systems. They are deprived the right to education and knowledge. In the face of this situation, all speak about dignified work. They who grab fabulous profits speak about dignified work but pay only a minor part of the produced wealth as salary. They who are funded by monopolies and multinationals trap the working class in the totally disguised methods and exploit them. They speak about dignified work, they who condemn unemployed people, migrants, youth and women to pauperization, and at the same time cause wars and death in other regions of the world. They who want to deprive the workers from the right to strike and from their means to claim and defend their demands speak about dignified work. Dignified, full and stable work for all, full labour rights, equality and safety in work and life cannot be implemented by those who exploit and perpetrate slavery. Dignified work can be claimed and covered only by the workers and their class-oriented trade unions with continuous, relentless and militant struggle until the abolition of exploitation man by man. Thank you.

Ms Díaz

Government (Ecuador)

Thank you, President. It's a great pleasure for the delegation of Ecuador to welcome you and congratulate you for being appointed as President of the 107th International Labour Conference, and Ecuador would also like to congratulate the others officers, the Vice-Presidents, and wish you every success in the work of the conference and the debates that are going to take place. The delegation of Ecuador would like to congratulate Director-General Guy Ryder for the presentation of his report on women at work, on the crucial role of women at work, and we agree with him when he says that there is a very long path to follow in order to achieve the goal of doing away with gender inequality. It is with great concern that Ecuador notes the figures that highlight the great debt that is owed to women when it comes to work and the labour market. Not only do we have a 30 per cent less chance of being able to be incorporated into the world of work, for obvious discrimination, but that we are also more likely to be victims of violence and harassment at work, and obviously what we have here is a latent debt. As far as Ecuador is concerned, achieving Objective 5 of Agenda 2030, i.e. achieving gender equality and empowering all women and girls, this is a top priority. Ecuador believes that this particular SDG must act as a catalyst for integral development, which is something that our peoples, our countries, are striving for. Ecuador welcomes with great satisfaction the fact that at this conference we are discussing and negotiating the terms of reference for a possible Convention, a binding Convention on violence and harassment at the work, and that we are doing this in a tripartite way. In this fashion, we are going to be able to update and institutionalize a matter which is not dealt with at the moment in labour standards, and which is of such fundamental importance. Ecuador feels that in dealing with equity and this kind of gender approach in a cross-cutting fashion does not simply mean adding a feminine component or a component of equality between genders to an existing activity. It's much more than increasing the participation of women. Ecuador is absolutely convinced that it's a question of incorporating the experience, knowledge and interests of both women and men in order to achieve a peaceful, prosperous and sustainable world. President, in Ecuador we have a law to prevent and eradicate violence against women, and we are currently discussing how to develop a new labour code in which the gender perspective would be cross-cutting, and the main goal of this new labour code would be to achieve equality. In a similar fashion, Ecuador also has its National Development Plan 2017-2021, and aims to eradicate all forms of discrimination and violence for economic, social, cultural, religious reasons, ethnic reasons, reasons of age, disability and a lack of mobility, focusing on violence, gender violence and other similar manifestations. If we have a legislative framework of this kind, together with the operational plans in this particular area, it means of course that in Ecuador we are going to be able to continue to empower women who have been victims of violence, train them when it comes to their labour rights, make civil servants more aware of these various aspects, and also take a plan to incorporate women in our plan and our initiative into the UNDP Gender Equality Seal Programme, and obviously this targets public and private companies. Ecuador also attaches great importance to tripartite social dialogue and obviously is very much committed to creating labour policies, together with employer and worker organizations, which will allow us to have a frank dialogue and properly incorporate and respect the fundamental human rights. Finally, President, Ecuador is fully convinced that this is a matter that requires great political will, and considerable effort is being made through tripartism and with consistent cross-cutting legal frameworks and a greater awareness on the part of the people. And if we can bring together all our efforts and actions then, without a doubt, this will lead to greater equity and equality for women in the world of work and in all areas of society. Thank you very much.

Mr Riak

Employer (South Sudan)

Chair, distinguished delegates, on behalf of the employers of South Sudan, I have the pleasure of addressing this plenary. It is now six years since South Sudan joined the ILO, and every year we come to the International Labour Conference we get ourselves discussing issues relevant to the situation we are experiencing. In our country, South Sudan, emerging from 21 years of war and getting independence in 2011, issues like youth employment, labour migration and informal economy discussed as agendas in the 101 session of the ILC was relevant at that time. On this session, in the report of the Governing Body, presented to this session by the Chairperson, on the actions taken by the Governing Body 2016-2017, is informative and comprehensive. The report at the institutional level provided information on the strategic approach to future agenda setting of the International Labour Conference. The decisions of the Governing Body in relation to replacement and inclusion of some items on the agenda of the 108 and previous sessions and the coming sessions, the policy development level, the report also touched on issues to do with employment and social protection, social dialogue and development cooperation. That is all fine, but coming to the legal issues and labour standards, the report covered issues concerning the composition of the ILC delegates, as well as protection of the employers' and workers' delegates to the International Labour Conference, and the incomplete delegations of some of the countries to this conference. On this regard my comment is, in some cases late dissemination of information by the ILO Offices and the Government offices is a factor that effects the incomplete delegations to the conference. Because our Government also sometimes pays for only one delegate from the workers, one delegate from the employers, and the late coming of the information, arrangements sometimes affects the coming of the delegation in full sense. On the report of the Director-General, The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality, the tripartite discussion on violence and harassment on this session showed how sensitive the issue is. The reason why I do propose, alongside the ongoing process of setting standards for eradicating violence and harassment, efforts to develop manuals for protection from violence and harassment should be considered. On the ILO at work, ILO programme implementation 2016-2017, we do appreciate the good job done in Africa in the area of decent work and the result achieved so far. South Sudan, in 2015, developed an interim Decent Work Country Programme, which was supposed to be implemented by ILO Sub Regional Office in Cairo. After the African regional meeting in Addis Ababa, South Sudan was transferred to Addis Sub Regional Office. This transfer left things to be ... [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:16] As I conclude, South Sudan is in dire need for ... [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:25] ... able to fully get integrated and active at the regional and international level. I therefore call on the international community to support the people of South Sudan to attain lasting peace to create a conducive business environment that attracts investors and assure job creation, employment and decent work. Thank you.

Mr Sadien

Worker (Mauritius)

Mr Chairman, all protocol observed, ladies and gentlemen. I feel personally honoured to have been given the opportunity to attend this 107th conference of the ILO and to address this august assembly on behalf of workers of Mauritius. We recognize now that trade unions have brought to the field of intervention socio-economic, environmental, and climate change issues. It is therefore crucial for governments to ensure the active participation of trade unions in their discussions. Ignoring trade unions is tantamount to ignoring a large fraction of the population and depriving workers of a basic human right. Chairperson, distinguished guests, participants, industrial peace is a sine qua non for social stability, which in turn engenders economy growth in a given country. In this context, we feel gratified that Mr Guy Ryder, Director-General of the ILO, has put on the agenda, our discussions, the Future of Work. This will definitely incite social partners to reflect on challenges facing the world of work. Therefore, we recognize the importance for Mauritius to borrow and customize best practices from other countries. A good example where social dialogue has succeeded in Mauritius is the introduction of a national minimal wage as from January 2018, which has been made possible following a shared understanding among the three social partners through the National Minimum Wage Consultative Council. However, there are areas of concern for the trade union movement in Mauritius. The Employment Relations Act and the Employment Rights Act, two pieces of legalization which were implemented as from February 2009, are giving too much powers to the employers to hire and fire at their will. The present Government has committed itself to amend these laws to better protect the workers. We are still waiting for those amendments to be brought. Mr President, in the sugar sector, the Government have set up a joint technical committee, comprising of government and employers' representatives only, excluding workers' representatives, to look into the challenges facing the sector. Where is social dialogue in this case? The Public Gathering Act which hangs as a Damocles sword on the heads of trade unions has to be replaced. It is an illegal act for any group of more than 11 persons to meet peacefully in public. Through this legislation, trade unionists have been prosecuted on many occasions. I myself have been prosecuted by the police and fined under this piece of legislation. Since trade unions are still made to endure this undemocratic piece of legislation, which is also against several core labour standards of the ILO, we are impatiently waiting for this amendment. The National Economic and Social Council, which was an independent organization set up by an act of Parliament, has been dismantled in 2015 and replaced by a new one that is not really independent in terms of its composition and approach. There is no collective bargaining in the public service, which is key for promotion of quality public service. Salaries and conditions of service are decided in a unilateral manner by the Pay Research Bureau. Option forms issued to workers directly, and these options forms are irrevocable for a period of five years, meaning that any employee or union cannot appeal to any institution on salaries once the option form is signed. Again, on the issue of social dialogue we note that several parastatal organizations are not represented by worker representatives. Currently, the Deputy Prime Minister of Mauritius is strongly lobbying in favour of the privatization of water in Mauritius, which all unions and consumer associations are rejecting. In the process 150 workers have just been laid off currently in Mauritius. We are looking forward for the support and intervention of the ILO and trade unions worldwide to fight this prescription of the World Bank, which is serving multinationals instead of consumers. Trade unions should be considered as partners as they represent one of the three sides of a triangular platform of social dialogue. A country can have the best laws, or adopt the best convention, but can still be a bad student. To conclude, I would like to hasten to say that sustainable development will only be achieved through the promotion of participative democracy, access to information and practice of good governance. Social dialogue is not about window dressing, or about giving lip service, but means discussing in good faith. Distinguished guests, distinguished colleagues, ladies and gentlemen, I would like to thank you for your kind attention. Thank you very much.

Mr Sougouri

Government (Burkina Faso)

Thank you very much, Mr President. It's a true pleasure and a privilege for me to take the floor of behalf Burkina Faso during this the 107th Session of the conference to pledge our full commitment to consideration around the current and future challenges in the world of work. I would also like to address our sincere congratulations to the President and all the elected officers on their outstanding election. You can be assured of my country's full support to you in your work. May I also commend and congratulate the Director-General of the Office for the various noteworthy reforms undertaken within the ILO and the assistance always provided to our States. President, distinguished guests, well aware that the world of work is undergoing deep changes, with major consequences on labour relations, our country welcomes the initiative launched by the Director-General on the Future of Work to commemorate the centenary of the organization. For this centenary, our common consideration of the future of work, and its implications for the very future of the ILO, should allow us to understand and effectively respond to changes in the world of work in order to allow the ILO to carry out its mandates in favour of social justice. Indeed, there are still major social inequalities globally. Precarity and social exclusion are still considerable, despite scientific and technological progress. And that's why, as we face up to the major changes in the world of work, we need to come up with relevant solutions to strengthen the mandate of the ILO. These solutions will have to make it possible for it to meet the challenges to make international labour standards more effective, particularly those contained in the Philadelphia Declaration. Mr President, my country appreciates the quality of the report from the Director-General. We welcome the wealth and the rich debate around the question of gender equality at work. This is of crucial importance for the very mandate of our organization, which works day in day out to serve social justice worldwide. After taking notes of the continuing gender inequalities and social exclusion, my country's political authorities have undertaken strong commitments with the adoption of laws and policies to guarantee and promote equality. These commitments are in keeping with the search for relevant solutions to ensure that women can properly develop. The Centenary Initiative on Women at Work will teach us more about the appropriate responses we need to bring to this problem. Turning to social dialogue and tripartism, we fully endorse the appeal of the Director-General for a fresh spirit to pick up the challenges in the world of work. The recurrent discussion on social dialogue and tripartism gives us the opportunity to reaffirm and feed the values which are at the basis of these two realities. Changes in the world and labour relations require that we take these values on board to guarantee peace, inclusion and social justice, which are fundamental targets in the Constitution of the ILO. The development of the appropriate instruments, which is a task for this session to effectively combat violence and harassment in the world of work, is a major contribution to improving living conditions for the vulnerable, particularly for women. It's also urgent to share experience and to pool our efforts to develop policies and programmes based on the search for equitable globalization through effective cooperation, providing fresh opportunities to promote fair and equitable development. This development needs to be able to generate more jobs and sustainable businesses which respect the labour rights, equality between men and women, and protect those most at risk. So, distinguished colleagues, we must more than ever before build a future which is of benefit to one and all. This requires that we act effectively and together. The relevance and legitimacy of this organization will be assessed on the cornerstone of our resolve and ability to find innovative means to pick up the challenges which the world of work faces. I have faith in our ability to arrive at this as we approach the centenary of the ILO. May we be successful in our work. Thank you.

Ms Burrow

International Trade Union Confederation

Delegates, our world is fracturing. The Director-General aptly described a new brutalism in the world. The sad reality is that we are increasingly frightened of each other, which in turn is driving exclusion, even conflict. Multilateralism is at risk, and indeed it has been captured by the vested interests of corporate greed, and the people, their rights, their social protection and their environment have been relegated to second place to the dominance of the market. This House has stood for rights at work for almost 100 years. Its Constitution is as relevant today as it was then, and the Philadelphia Declaration spells out the priorities we must never forget. Where employment is secure, where rights are respected, where work is safe, and women and men are free from violence and harassment, from bullying, this humanity can help repair our societies. Therefore, the Sustainable Development Goals have our full support, but UN reforms must be about cooperation, not control. And the independence of the ILO governance, including the normative and supervisory mechanisms, programming and funding mechanisms, are essential. The ILO's staff are entitled to collective bargaining rights and the right to strike. To rebuild the trust of working people and to prevent a retreat into nationalism driven by extreme political forces, the world needs a new social contract, universal social protection, minimum wages on which people can live with dignity, collective bargaining that shares prosperity, negotiated industry solutions for decent work, just wages, and education and skills, including for those workers in non-standard forms of employment. Technology must never be a driver of exploitation. New technology can never mean medieval conditions for your people. And a social licence to operate for all businesses where they pay tax at the point of earnings, contribute to social protection systems, take responsibility for the employment relationship across all digital platforms, due diligence against the risk of exploitation in the workplaces both direct and in supply chains, and the establishment of grievance mechanisms for remedy at all levels of corporate activity is the minimum. The G20 said last year that violations of labour rights can never be part of the competition. So let's build a fair competition floor for a new economic model that people can trust. We congratulate the DG on the commission on the Future of Work and look forward to the report that covers all these dimensions, including commitment to vital, just transition measures. The centenary conference must equally focus on equality for women, and again we welcome the DG's contribution in his report with the vital areas of action. We urge all governments to start now, by actually supporting a Convention to mitigate violence against women and men in the world of work. And we urge the employers to work with us to strengthen social dialogue and collective bargaining everywhere at all levels. The Global Deal just adds an opportunity for a further partnership. Our message to employer is don't be frightened of negotiating a just future. It's your future too. And in conclusion can I say, the annexed report, the situation of workers in the occupied territory is just a disgrace. The workers of Palestine are entitled to decent work. Fifty years of occupation, it must end, and the killings must stop. We welcome the Swedish Government's recognition of Palestine as a State. And we ask all Governments to do likewise to ensure security for both Palestine and Israel, the workers in those countries and the opportunities for rights, decent work and social justice. Thank you.

Ms Baghli

Organization of the Islamic Cooperation

I would like first to extend our appreciation to the Director-General for the outstanding work he is doing in preparing the ILO centenary. In this regard, we welcome his seven Centenary Initiatives, all of great importance, for defining the future. Among them, the Women at Work Initiative subject matter today is particularly valuable to the OIC. The Organization of Islamic Cooperation accords a great importance to socio-economic cooperation among its member States. At their fourth meeting in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, in February this year, the Ministers of Labour elaborated a common strategy for manpower development and adopted different legal frameworks to harmonize standards and practices on labour issues among member States, such as the OIC Labour Market Strategy, the OIC Agreement on Mutual Recognition Arrangement of Skilled Workforce and the OIC Standard Bilateral Agreement on Exchange of Manpower. Similarly, the Ministers in charge of women's role in the development of OIC member States meet to promote women advancement and empowerment in the Muslim world and to contribute to enhancing women's full participation in the development process and enabling a brighter future for societies. As the rest of the world, OIC countries are undergoing substantial changes due to the ever-growing number of educated women. Though this phenomenon is most welcomed, necessary measures should be taken to allow them access to the world of work. During the latest ministerial meeting in 2016, the OIC revised its plan of action for the investment of women in member States. Economic empowerment enhancing women's access to equal economic opportunity in the public and private sector, and social protection, improving and ensuring women's social needs, safety and wellbeing are among the plan of action's objectives. Another key objective is the protection of women from violence, by combating all forms of gender-based violence, human trafficking on the one hand, and by ensuring that they are not deprived from opportunities and full enjoyment of their rights on the other hand. Furthermore, the OIC 2025 Programme of Action defines the advancement and empowerment of women, family welfare and social security as a priority area. It encourages women's participation in the labour force and their inclusion in social security systems. The Programme of Action equally sets the need to develop appropriate legislative and administrative measures to fight violence against women. Moreover, promoting labour protection, wages, working time, and occupational safety and health as essential components of decent work is at the core of the OIC 2025 agenda. Mr President, distinguished delegates, another area of great concern to the OIC, and to many other delegations as we heard, is the plight of the Palestinian people. We are thankful to the DG who submits high quality reports each year to the ILC on the situation of the workers of the occupied Arab territories. His report this year states that the highest unemployment rate in the world is in the occupied Arab territories. Besides unemployment, the daily life of Palestinians is becoming merely a quest for survival. Thank you very much.

Trade Union International of Pensioners and Retired Persons

I speak on behalf of all the retired people. We speak on behalf of the only organization which actually represents us. We have the same demands which have been reviewed from a class point of view. Karl Marx got it right, that there has to be a class struggle here. And this is inherit, basically, that there are classes pitted against each other in capitalism. This is something, until we change things here, we will only see that there will be mainly defenders of capitalism speaking in the house. But if we have them, the capitalists in charge will go from crisis to crisis, and we will see this as something that we cannot afford until capitalism comes to its logical conclusion. We are supporters of socialism, which will be the future in all countries of the planet, even if pro-capitalists try to delay this change. The experience of the former socialist countries has made it possible to learn from the mistakes made, and for that reason the second stage of extension of socialism will be the definitive one. While we do not recover the advantages of socialism for the majority of human beings, we will continue to organize ourselves within the context of capitalism. Today, I can announce that we are going to hold our second world congress of pensioners and retirees of class organizations at the beginning of next year in a country of Latin America. In this area of the world where there are large organizations with millions of members who defend the rights of pensioners from a class attack. In America, Asia, all continents we have organised the pensioners in the five continents to obtain a decent (vgr INAUDIBLE 2:21]. We will continue to support these pensioners in all five continents. We have shown that we can do much to defend their rights and to make their just demands be respected. We will continue to support the pensioners and retirees in struggles, country by country. So at the end of the day, all legislation will recognize that every person over the age of 60 should receive a public pension. We don't want to see private pensions which just our good for unions, who are not worthy of the name and capitalism. We want to make sure that people have sufficiently healthy food and free public attention to their needs in terms of health, culture, and local transport, and this regardless of whether the pensioner had sufficiently contributed during their active life as workers. If you didn't pay into the system was it really your fault? No, it was the fault of those who run capitalism, those who did not give you the job that you asked for. You, the pro-capitalist prefer to ... there are millions are underemployed people, in order to keep wages low, based on these false laws of the market, which are only applied to those who do not own the means of production. On the other hands, to the owners of the means of production, you grant the advantages and subsidies. You get every benefit via tax havens and other scams. Those that manage capitalism, those that are the owners of multinationals, many of you are here present in this room as I speak, those who are extracting the benefits of exploitation. Everything was very well observed by Marx and the Marxists. But little by little the majority of the population will stop political parties who promise one thing and do the opposite. They'll stop voting for them, the lies, the basis of the false bourgeois democracy. Even though for decades you have been deceiving the voters, this will soon end. We know that there is enough wealth on the planet to ensure that pensions are paid out of state budgets. It would be enough if people would simply allocate 2 per cent of gross domestic products of the capitalist states spent on war, as has been ordered by NATO, and direct that money, allocate that money to facilitate dignified lives for all the people in the world. We pensioners are on track to be 30 per cent of the voters, and from our class organizations we are going to ensure that no vote goes to political parties that defend capitalism. We are going to transmit to the new generations our important experiences of struggle against the exploitative businessmen. In our experience, we will see the achievements of the working class in the past decades, and thanks to the WFTU we have seen great achievements made, greater improvements for holidays, labour rights, safety at work, public health and education, and indeed, pensions. In addition, we have more than 100 years of experience of the good functioning of labour rights in countries that are actually tried to build socialism. Today, its inhabitants regret having lost the individual rights they enjoyed for decades, and will surely enjoy again in the future when we end the exploitation of man by man. You should know that pensioners and retirees will fight alongside the working class for our just rights until the last day of our lives. Long live the working class. Long live the World Federation of Travel Unions. Long live socialism. Long and a profitable life for pensioners and the retired.

Latin American Association of Labour Lawyers

We would like to welcome everybody who's present in the room, to the Officers of the conference, and in particular those who are responsible for translation and the logistics of the conference. On behalf of the Latin American Association of Labour Lawyers, an organization that brings together the associations of labour lawyers of 15 countries, we very much welcome the Director-General's report on the Women at Work Initiative, a new push for gender equality. It is of pressing importance that we realize that working conditions of the current time continue to be far more burdensome for women, and it goes without saying that gender-related issues are relevant and must be involved in any discussion today, and they must also form part of any future debate which is proposed on these matters and which relates to the world of work. We would like to stress the fact that currently we see that there is a new stage in the model of capitalist accumulation which is going hand in hand with a particular form of work. Over the last decades of the twentieth century, and in the first years of the twenty-first century, we have seen examples of this in outsourcing, flexibilization and deregulation of labour relations. These are phenomena that are noted at a world level but are being felt particularly in the Latin American countries where their dependant economies are subordinate to the legal apparatus. And we have seen that the minimum margins which are allowed for labour law and labour rights are impacted by the aggressive nature of the different sets of rules which regulate human work. And all of this, under penalty, and at the risk of not linking appropriately to the globalized world. Furthermore, there is also the fundamental question of the fact that the framework of protection for any kind of labour activity seems to be pushing away a lot of people from the world of work and doesn't actually cover them anymore. So these specific features and characteristics which cover the world of work at the moment mean that very many workers' associations are restricted in their activities and their socio-political activities because the forms of regulated organizations, which up until now have responded to the reality of labour relations, are hindering the forms of association, collective bargaining, and a strike which are allowed under national laws. And rather than promoting the strengthening of trade unions to protect the weakest part of the capital contradiction, we can see the doors being opened, the flaunting of collective bargaining agreements, and the recent legislative reforms in Brazil and Argentina are an example of this. So work is more than just a legal definition. It's an activity through which the human being makes of the world something for him or herself. And obviously we have to ensure that the degrees of protection that are required increase and do not decrease. And faced with the conditions that I have just described, the Latin American Association of Labour Lawyers has proposed a socio and Latin American socio-labour charter, which is not just a simple and arbitrary gathering together of rights, freedoms and guarantees, but something far more ambitious. It's the expression of a new model of labour relations which, based on the inviolability of the dignity of the individual who works, brings together in a natural and logical way this person's rights, and provides a framework for a true process of regional integration. The charter is based on the universal demand of decent working conditions and guaranteeing a real right to access maintenance and real stability of work. We also are aiming for wages and salaries which are sufficient to overcome poverty and which guarantee the right to integral education, to training and empowerment, which also guarantee a right to health and safety, the integral right to health, or to culture, to rest and recreation time for workers and their families. We also want a real universalization of social security systems, and we do all of this for certainty that none of these essential and vital rights can ever be properly guaranteed without proper liberty, freedom and trade union democracy, and without the right to collective bargaining, and without the possibility to go ahead with social protest and an unrestricted exercise of the right to strike. We, the Latin American Association of Labour Lawyers feels that these categories of rights should cover all kinds of workers, whether from the private sector or public sector, as well as any kind of worker in a condition of economic subordination and also self-employed workers ... [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:02] ... whether we are talking about workers in the urban or rural areas. And then of course we have to take specific account of the rights of indigenous peoples and other vulnerable groups. Workers of the world unite.

Mr Noonan

Building and Wood Workers' International

Thank you Vice-President, delegates, observers, guests, good afternoon. It's an honour for me to address you to share the struggle of our union, the CFMEU, against the anti-worker and anti-trade union agenda of the right-wing Australian liberal Government. Last year our union along with the Australia Council of Trade Unions and Building and Wood Workers' International filed a complaint to the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association regarding the Australian Building and Construction Commission, the ABCC. Prior to its repeal, the previous iteration of the ABCC was the subject of an earlier complaint brought by the Australian Council of Trade Unions to the Committee on Freedom of Association, case number 2326, and for a number of years thereafter was dealt with by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, CEACR. In previous ILO jurisprudence, the CFA and CEACR took an extremely dim view of the ABCC, demanding that the Australian Government modify provisions regarding unlawful industrial action, eliminate excessive impediments, penalties and sanctions against industrial action in the building and construction industry, and ensure that bargaining is left to the discretion of the parties involved. Further, they requested the Australian Government take the necessary steps to promote collective bargaining as provided in C98, and introduce sufficient safeguards to ensure that the function of ABCC does not interfere with the general affairs of trade unions. The current law retains all of the provisions which the ILO has previously found in breach of Conventions 87 and 98. The ABCC is a revived institution designed to attack construction workers' rights to freedom of association and the right for workers to work in safe, healthy, and decent conditions. The BWI and CFMEU welcome the dismissal of baseless politically motivated criminal charges brought against our officials John Setka and Shaun Reardon. Trade unions in the Asia Pacific are working aggressively to safeguard hard-won progressive labour laws and opposing oppressive regimes. The unions of the Philippines are exposing the dictatorial tendencies of President Duterte and making him accountable for more than 13,000 deaths on the fake war against drugs and failing to fulfil his election promise to end contractualization. Cambodian unions are fighting to ensure rights to freedom of association and collective bargaining, as well as freedom of assembly and freedom of speech. Trade unions in Thailand are pushing for the immediate conduct of national elections being held hostage by the military junta. In India millions of workers have protested against regressive labour reform laws. In South Korea, the BWI welcomes the release of Han Sang-gyun, former president of the KCTU, who has been in prison for nearly three years, but the struggle for ratification of conventions 87 and 98 continues in South Korea. Meanwhile, our brothers and sisters in Fiji are taking to task the current Government, demanding that it comply with its obligations to ILO core Conventions. It is clear that in many parts of the world the rules are broken to the detriment of workers and their communities, and it is unions that are fighting back. The BWI is no stranger to changing the rules. For the last decade, BWI affiliates across the world have organised construction workers, many of them migrants in extremely vulnerable situations in mega sports events. The BWI's engagement in sporting events like the FIFA World Cup and the Olympics aims to ensure decent work, safe working and living conditions, and dignity for all workers. This has been our objective from South Africa to Brazil to Russia and to Qatar. In Qatar there have been significant positive developments as a result of BWI's campaign and engagement with various stakeholders. The opening of the ILO Project Office and the announcements made by the Qatari Government promising sweeping changes are positive steps forward. However, the real test will be if the lives of workers are improved on the ground. In BWI's sectors which are traditionally considered to be male-dominated industries, an increasing number of women are part of the work force, particularly in the global south. Sexual harassment, discrimination and violence against women are unfortunately very common in these industries, as in other sectors. The BWI strongly supports the adoption of an ILO Convention accompanied by a Recommendation on violence and harassment against women and men in the world of work, with a strong focus on the gender dimension of violence. Delegates, thanks for your attention, and thanks for your attendance here this afternoon.

Confederation of Latin American and Caribbean Public Workers

President of the 107th ILC and government representatives, I would like to speak here today as the President of the Confederation of Latin American and Caribbean Public Workers. We very much like the Director-General's report on The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality. The efforts of the ILO to fight for gender equality is something which is of great interest to unions, but it also means that you have got to see that this inequality plays on two different levels affecting most women. First of all, the inequality in the world of work but also in society in general. The mobilizations of women, which started with the 3 June 2015 in Latin America and which led then to the first international women's strikes in 2017, have given testimony to the fact that there's a lot changing in our societies, our economies and our cultures. Now, historically, women have had a subordinate role to men. They have had their liberty, their integrity, their work, and their life outcomes playing second fiddle. Women have been the ones who over the last years have made it very clear of the link between a patriarchal system which enables gender inequality and an economic system based on exploitation which leads to unstable jobs, precarious jobs, ones without decent salaries and with working conditions which affect health and the very wellbeing of men and women at work, as the main cause of the increase of violence and discrimination against women. Men and women working in the public sector are quite concerned about atypical or precarious types of work which come into the fore and the increasing use of outsourcing, which is even being used by the State for labour contracting. And here we invite the ILO to discuss in great detail the challenges which this presents for the future of work. In this context, we should mention that women are overrepresented in the most precarious forms of work. Within the labour union movement, women workers have made it very clear to us that we can no longer turn a blind eye to class inequality as it goes hand in hand with gender equality. Neither one can be solved. We have to solve gender equality at the same time we solve class inequality. Also, we see that in the history of the ILO they have been very involved, first of all in protecting women workers, but now this has to be extended in a more general sense to gender equality. And this as the Report of the Director-General means that the role of men in society has to change. The role of family has to change. There has to be a progressive integration also of woman into the cultural, social and economic lives of our countries. We need to promote protection of women who are also working in the caregiving sector. That's one of the first steps which will help us deal with the existing asymmetries. We need to make sure that the State does everything they can to provide better support to the caregivers sector. This will have a virtuous system. It will lead to more jobs being created. It will also mean that man will go into these jobs, which traditionally were considered to be women's work, and will lead to a redefinition of these types of jobs in the world of work. As a union, we think that when it comes to the solution for inequality, for violence or for discrimination which affect women workers, we need to make use of a specific tool. The tool here being collective bargaining. There we can define explicitly concrete mechanism which can be used to try to combat these problems. I would not want to conclude my speech without saying something about the time-money-agency conundrum as covered by the Director-General's report. Here we must recognize that men have had certain privileges, sometimes invisible privileges. One of these would be the possibility of trying to decide if we want to have a life with family obligations or not. Do we want to be parents or not? Can women make the same choice? Unless we have a right to family planning recognized as sexual education recognizes, it's very unlikely that women will enjoy from this right. As the head of a confederation that represents a large number of women and men working in the health sector, this is indeed a health issue, and we have to see that this is not the type thing that should be criminalized or dealt with via penal courts. We would also like to say that we wanted to be happy to say that this is the 40th anniversary of the public service convention, but now as we see the situation of public workers in so many countries where people are losing their jobs, we can't celebrate that event. Unfortunately, our Governments are quite often undoing the advances which were made in the area of collective bargaining over this period, including the first decade of this century. So we call upon the Governments of the world, and particularly those of Latin America and the Caribbean, to do away with all types and all forms of violence in the workplace, and including in that the doing away with the poor treatment and the stigmatization of public service workers. We believe that, via our work, we can help ensure and guarantee the rights of all workers in all countries.

European Centre for Workers' Questions

Dear Mr President, Vice-President and delegates, the European Centre for Workers' Questions is very honoured to participate in the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference and to have the opportunity to address the plenary of this important conference. EZA welcomes very much the ILO's analysis, efforts and steps in its Women at Work Centenary Initiative as they are presented in the Report of the Director-General. The 73 workers' organizations from 30 European countries of EZA have established since 2003 an international platform for equal opportunities with the purpose to include the gender perspective as a permanent and transversal dimension into our work. The platform aims to promote gender equality at work. It is a forum of exchange of information, experience and good practices on equality issues. The platform is an enhancement of the seminars and the projects run by EZA and using the conclusions and results on a political level in Europe. We have to recognize that a targeted work balance everywhere, and also in Europe, remains still an important challenge that demands a great deal of patience and stamina from women who continue to face double burdens. Women are experiencing still important inequalities in work and pay, glass ceilings, inflexible models of work, difficulties and disadvantages in returning to work. Further challenges include the sharing of family responsibility, improving the perception of upbringing and care tasks by fathers, and the unilateral promotion of the dual role of women, and the continuation of barriers to equality. These are important issues in the field of social partnership and social dialogue. The European Union has established, and equal treatment legislation sets out, minimum levels of protection that apply to everyone living and working in the European Union. EU gender equality is also an integral part of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union which prohibits discrimination on any grounds including sex, at Article 21, and recognizes the right to gender equality in all areas and the necessity of positive action for its promotion. The ILO's fundamental Conventions on equality of opportunity and treatment form also a very important legal base to guarantee equality between men and women at work. As European Centre for Workers' Questions, we see an urgent need for the development of new culture, of equality and work life balance in Europe based on a strong legal foundation. There is a lack of models of work, education and care that are equally oriented and socially recognised. This lack must be eliminated quickly and social dialogue must be used for that. We are fully sharing the Gallup ILO survey findings, showing that both women and men in all regions identified work family balance and affordable care as one of the biggest challenges women face in the world of work, as is said in the report of the Director-General. EZA welcomes the ILO Women at Work Centenary Initiative with its various approaches and measures, among others, to fight violence and harassment in the world of work, to promote equal pay and to develop research and knowledge. We want to contribute to support the ILO's Women at Work Centenary Initiative with our educational activities. The Director-General declares, in his report, we are still a long way from the goal of equality and progress towards it is slow, uneven and uncertain. Thank you very much.

Ms Yafa

Education International

I am Fatoumata Bintou Yafa, Secretary-General of the Elementary Teachers' Union in Senegal. On behalf of Education International, I am taking the floor to thank the Director-General of the ILO for his very relevant report. Education International appreciates the selection of cross-cutting elements relating to international labour standards, equality and non-discrimination and social dialogue, three elements which are crucial but are very often missing from the teaching profession. We also commend the initiatives of the ILO to support the constituents' actions to strengthen social dialogue, create decent jobs, to achieve social protection, health and safety at work, and for vocational training for refugees. Capacity building for the unions to tackle technological innovation, climate change and population change are one of the priorities of the twenty-first century for which support from the ILO will be decisive. Education International, through me, expresses the concerns and desires of more than 32 million teachers, men and women, worldwide. The ILO commission on the Future of Work leading up to the centenary, as well as the Sustainable Development Goals, underscored the need for States to train and recruit 70 million new teachers to allow all children, adolescents and adults to learn without discrimination in good conditions. Building the future with decent work is the motif of this conference. Decent work is what teaching staff and teachers are trying to obtain worldwide, but most Governments and private enterprises don't make it easy for them because they hamper their mission rather than supporting them, and it starts in infants school which is far too little widespread and is often inaccessible in emerging countries. Primary and secondary education is often of low quality with overcrowded classrooms and poorly trained and badly supported teachers, particularly in the countryside. In some countries, particularly in Western Africa or in South East Asia, you quite frequently see teachers facing 200 pupils. With such a situation the teacher has to find the means to teach. Who could teach reading and writing and maths to 200 children at the same time without exercise books, textbooks, blackboards or teaching materials? How can you achieve the aim of quality teaching in such conditions? Our countries are lacking in women teachers, women who could be models for little girls. Vocational training is poorly esteemed and higher education is inaccessible to most young future workers. Add to that the fact that our schools aren't always safe, particularly when you look at buildings, security, weather conditions, etc. Rather than being supported, teachers, men and women, are overwhelmed with administrative paperwork, red tape, tests and assessments. They have to meet various targets which are decided without consultation with them by administrations which are out of touch, whereas the mission of the teacher is to teach future citizens who can, of course, work but who can think, make well-considered choices for their own future and for that of the community. In so many countries, teachers, as civil servants, are deprived of the fundamental right to set up unions and several cases have been underscored by the Committee on the Application of Standards. We note that no mention is made of the following cases: in South Korea, members of the KTU education are still illegal members, despite ILO recommendations and the commitment of the Government; in Turkey, more than 28,000 teachers and university staff have been sacked since July 2016; 1,620 members of the EGITIM SENE Union, an affiliate of the Education International, will be stripped of their functions. And also, pupils and teachers are victims of violence and harassment, as we said in the committee on violence and sexual and moral harassment against women and men worldwide in the world of work. And this is why Education International really does hope, in the context of inclusive constructive dialogue, that Governments with ILO's support and the participation of the social partners will implement policies which can promote quality education for one and all. Thank you very much.

Ms Longley

International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Associations

Representatives of Governments and employers, sisters and brothers from the Workers' group, my name is Sue Longley, and I am speaking on behalf of the IUF, the global trade union federation representing workers in agriculture, food processing, tobacco, hotels, restaurants, catering and tourism. I want to congratulate the Director-General and the Office on the excellent report, Women at Work: The push for equality. It addresses very frankly the challenges facing us, including questions about the role and place of women in this organization, and I certainly hope the figures this year are better on women speaking in the plenary, although this afternoon has already been a good indication of change. My organization, the IUF, represents many millions of women workers. According to the ILO, women now make up over 40 per cent of the hired labour force in agriculture and almost 70 per cent of the tourism workforce. Most of them are in jobs regarded as low skilled. They are underpaid and undervalued. Many are in precarious work. Outsourcing and contracting out of work are widespread in our sectors, and agriculture and tourism have many seasonal and temporary workers. Migrant workers make up a significant part of the workforce in both sectors. So what are the consequences of these non-standard forms of employment? Well, there are many, but the one I want to address today is sexual harassment. Women in agriculture, hotels, tourism, and also in food processing have to give sexual favours to managers and supervisors to make sure they get work. The DG's report rightly refers to the vulnerability of women to sexual harassment and acknowledges the impact of the #MeToo and the Time's Up campaign in drawing attention to sexual harassment, especially in the film industry and media, but we know that sexual harassment is a regular daily occurrence for women workers in agriculture, hotels and restaurants. Surveys around the world have indicated that a large majority of hospitality workers, up to 89 per cent in some countries, have experienced sexual harassment on the job in the course of their working lives. For this reason, we are calling on companies, on employers, to work with us to ensure an end to this scourge of sexual harassment. Last week here in Geneva, with affiliates from hotel workers around the world, we launched a global set of demands calling on the world's largest hotel company to work with unions to end this endemic sexual harassment which plagues the industry. We have very concrete demands. We want prevention measures, quicker response times to reports of sexual harassment. We want protection for workers who report sexual harassment from guests, managers or co-workers. We have a list of demands, very clear, a very precise programme of action. We then held a meeting here in the ILO to discuss gender inequality in the tourism sector. At that meeting, hotel workers told us of their personal experiences of sexual harassment and assault by guests, and I tell you it was very hard to listen to their stories, to see them in tears, recounting how their lives had been affected by this trauma, how management blame the victim and fail to take adequate measures to protect workers, but what bravery and conviction. I was proud to be with them, proud to offer the support we could, but I don't want you to think that women are passive victims of gender discrimination. In my experience women are organizing and fighting back in many places. Our affiliates have impressive campaigns at national level. In the Nordic countries, we are not on the menu. In the USA and Canada, Hands Off Pants On, both get the message to customers that sexual harassment is not tolerated. The IUF has now achieved national agreements with three transnational companies, one in agriculture, one in food and one in catering, on zero tolerance of sexual harassment in the workplace. All three agreements include procedures to ensure that the policy works. These agreements are being used by our affiliates to negotiate local implementation plans with management. The DG's report asks what's to be done to change things? Well, on sexual harassment I think for us it's clear. We need strong policy statements that sexual harassment will not be tolerated and there needs also to be urgent action to reduce women's vulnerability by improving their position in the workforce and challenging gender stereotypes. This can be done. You need to go into communities, talk with families about what jobs daughters, sisters and wives will be doing. We work with personnel departments looking at recruitment procedures. We challenge gender bias in selection procedures. We change perceptions from the bottom up with our affiliates. In Pakistan in 2016, we were able to get one woman hired as a forklift truck driver at a major global beverage company. She was the first woman truck driver in Pakistan. There are now 9 women working as forklift truck drivers and 19 in the factory. In conclusion, Chair, all of this says to the IUF that we want the adoption of a Convention and a strong Recommendation on ending violence and harassment in the workplace. It's not only necessary but it would send out the right commitment about the ILO's commitment to building equality. The IUF strongly supports the Convention Recommendation on violence and harassment in the world of work. Thank you.

Public Services International

PSI would be very happy if we could celebrate the anniversary with a Convention and a Recommendation against violence and harassment in the world of work as decided on Saturday, particularly if they will consider the specific gender dimension of violence. Trade unions are the largest organized group of citizens globally. Our democratic organization does represent millions of people around the world and plays a crucial role in the society and in the ILO. The commitment of trade union members to build a better world is stronger than ever, as greater than ever are inequality and injustice. If we want to make sure that no one is left behind, we must be bold and say that another world is possible. The global system is broken. Things must change, and the time for change is now. We refute any apologetic discourse on the relevance of social partners and collective bargaining when we witness daily violation of workers' rights. Building coalition with civil society organizations is key for the broad-based policy shift that we need, but it cannot be an alternative to negotiations between the key actors in the world of work, nor dilute the social dialogue and the tripartite system. Since 2012 the ILO has been in crisis. At the same time the wage share in GDPs around the world continues to shrink and profit becomes sweeter for the happy few. Forms of workers' exploitation are multiplying, hurting migrants first. This proves the relevance of the ILO and unions for workers. Defending the ILO means renewing the vision and commitment of its founders to reduce inequality and build social stability, peaceful and democratic society for the next hundred years. Public services play a central role in defending human rights and achieving sustainable development, and States are responsible. This needs to be a cornerstone of the future of work and reflected in next year's conference. The challenges of climate change and digitalization require strong public investment and strong public governance to protect the individual and collective rights, ultimately to defend democracy. Last week PSI celebrated the 40th anniversary of Convention 151. While the low level of ratification continues to be worrisome, PSI salutes countries that have recently ratified it as the Philippines. Convention 151 goes hand in hand with Convention 98. The right to organize for public service workers must go along with the right to collective bargaining and the right to strike. Despite the willingness of countries such as Liberia to take steps forward, public sector workers in many countries continue to be denied the right to organize, particularly in emergency services. PSI encourages the ILO to support the introduction of social dialogue in the public sector as a priority. Transparency and fight against corruptions require protection of whistle-blowers and an international labour standard is urgent to support the national legislations that are starting to address the problem. The ILO mandate cannot be weakened, and its role in development has to look beyond the global agenda. Funding remains an important challenge, but engaging in public private partnership is not the solution. This is about providing technical know-how and policy advice to make a difference for working people. We do not want social protection coverage when it is about insurance companies selling empty promises to ensure their profit. We need public health and the human right to help for all, as we need public education, public water and public sanitation. We do not want that the ILO becomes the promoter of PPPs, that we know they do not deliver and cause long-term public indebtment, but that it strengthens the sectorial activities serving the communities and the constituents instead of private entities. Multinational corporations can play a crucial role in the global economy by paying their fair share of taxes where they operate and decent wages to their workers throughout the supply chain. To conclude, allow me to express our solidarity with the UN staff union and deeply regret the unilateral pay cut applied to the staff of UN organizations. The ILO centenary is the right time to recognize UN workers' trade union rights including collective bargaining. Thank you.

Make Mothers Matter

Thank you, Chair. Make Mothers Matter, MMM, would like to thank and congratulate the Director-General for his excellent report and welcomes this new push for gender equality. [vgr INTERRUPTION 0:41] ... is that the women's time-money-agency conundrum must be addressed as the main structural obstacle to further progress on gender equality. Central to this conundrum is the issue of unpaid family care work, that is the unequal distribution between men and women of the unpaid domestic and care work which is essential to reproducing and sustaining families, and which, in fact, supports the whole economy and society. Globally, women still do two and a half times more unpaid care and domestic work than men.

It is also well established that when paid and unpaid work is combined, on average women work longer hours than men. Yet, instead of being recognized and valued for combining this care and professional responsibilities, women continue to be penalized, mothers especially encounter systematic discriminations and obstacles in hiring and promotion, and suffer for harassment and wage discrimination linked to motherhood, the motherhood pay gap. Addressing these issues goes well beyond the labour sector alone and requires a multi-sectorial approach also involving education, health, social welfare and fiscal sectors. Allow me to share with you some of MMM recommendations. First, promote care as valuable work and consider public spending on policies that support the unpaid care work of nurturing, rising, educating children as an investment in early childhood development and human capital and not as a mere expenditure. The potential return on investment is high. In addition to preventing social and health problems linked to burn-out and stress, and to countering declining fertility rates in developed countries, this investment could help ensure that every child develops to their full potential, which in turn could break the cycle of poverty, prevent violence and foster more peaceful societies. Second, provide accessible, affordable and high quality public services and infrastructure, in particular in the most disadvantaged and remote areas, with the explicit objective of addressing women's time poverty. Water, electricity, energy, ICTs, transportation, proximity to childcare and healthcare are needed to significantly reduce the time spent on unpaid domestic and care work and thus free up time for remunerated activities. Third, promote the equal sharing of care responsibilities between men and women, starting with paid paternity leave and shared paid parental leave. However, paternity leave alone will not do the job. It is the whole system that needs to be adapted to the new realities of fatherhood, including how boys are educated. Fourth, promote diverse work and family life reconciliation policies accessible to all, including the right to request flexible working arrangements to allow parents and other caregivers to access and stay in paid work. In particular, ensure regulations supporting equality, part-time work and job-sharing schemes, but allow both men and women to adjust their workload to their family responsibilities and reduce discrimination against part-time workers regarding career advancement, pay levels, social security, pension rights, etc. Fifth, caring and educating a child requires time. Take a life-course perspective and facilitate discontinuous career paths rather than leaner ones, allowing men and women to withdraw from work partially or completely to care for their children or dependent relatives and then re-enter the labour market without being heavily penalised. Sixth, building on the resolution adapted at the 2013 International Conference of Labour Statisticians, make unpaid family care work visible to policymakers and society by regularly conducting good quality Time Use surveys and legally recognize unpaid family care work as being a particular category of labour that gives status and rights to caregivers, including access to social security, education and training as well as care credits in the calculation of pension rights. In conclusion, addressing the issue of unpaid care work to progress on gender equality requires systemic changes and paradigm shifts. It's about putting care, education and the wellbeing of people and the planet at the centre of government priorities and policies. It's also about taking a long-term perspective and investing for the future, moving away from short-term GDP growth and shifting to a new economic model. Thank you, Chair, for your attention.

Government (Brazil)

Brazil would like to exercise its right of reply. The Brazilian Labour Legislation dated back to 1943 and needed to be updated in order to address the requirements of the economy of the twenty-first century. After a comprehensive discussion in Parliament where the regional tax was studied, discussed and perfected, the bill was approved by a significant majority, both at the Chamber of Representatives and the Federal Senate. Law 13.467 was enacted in July 2017 and entered into force in November last year. The new legislation establishes regimes that are compatible with the contemporary economy. It extends legal protection to specific situations of the economy that were previously uncovered, such as telework, part-time work, intermittent work and a 12 by 36 hour scheme. Hiring has been facilitated and formalization encouraged. Enhancing conventions and collective agreements between unions and employers is another key aspect of our modernized legislation. The aim is that each category be able to negotiate collectively the best terms to reconcile employment equality, increase our productivity and protection of the workers' rights. The labour rights enshrine Article 7 of the Federal Constitution a robust and unique protection for Brazilian workers are fully preserved. Coherently with the goals of formalization ensuring the rights of workers, the legislation increases eight times the amount of the fine directed to the employer who does not reduce [vgr INAUDIBLE 1:37] workers. The new legislation also reinforces the promotion of women's rights in the labour market including through implementation of a fine for cases of salary discrimination based on gender. The new legislation enforced for only the last six months has still a way to go in order to placate the unacceptably high unemployment rate left by one of the worst economic crises in Brazil in 2015 and 2016, but figures for the first quarter of this year show a promising way ahead with the creation of more than 330,000 jobs, a number not seen in Brazil in the last five years. I thank you very much, Mr Vice-President.

Worker (Somalia)

Thank you, Chair. Distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of the Federation of Somali Trade Unionists, I bring you fraternal greetings from the working men and women in Somalia. Indeed, it gives me great pleasure to address the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like to congratulate the ILO Director-General, Mr Guy Ryder, for the well-researched and thoughtful report that he has presented to this august assembly for discussion. The Director-General's report on the Woman at Work Initiative, the ILO Centenary Initiative and the conference agenda item to address violence and harassment at work are all key in our quest to circumvent obstacles to gender inequality, in particular the structural factors that are responsible for the marginalization of woman at work and community. Somalia has been plagued by crises engendered by barbaric and cyclic natural disasters for more than two decades. This dark history of our country is a universal knowledge. Despite this challenge, we Somalis are hopeful and are committed to a better future by conciliating the gains and dividends of peace and resilience that characterize post-conflict and fragile States. Gender-based violence and decent work deficits are key chronic issues in Somalia. Women are not only breadwinners, they are also the economic backbone of our society, but this has for too long gone unnoticed in our besieged country. For this reason, the Federation of Somalia Trade Unionist supports the adoption of a comprehensive ILO Convention and Recommendation on violence and harassment against woman and men in the world of work. As this conference unfolds, the Somalia Government has made a significant and positive move in adopting the Sexual Offences Bill which combats sexual harassment and violence against woman. We congratulate the Somalia Government for this historic initiative, especially the wonderful work of the Minister of Human Rights and Women, Her Excellence Deqa Yasin, for challenging the dangers and ensuring that this bill is tabled. No country is desperately in need for decent work more than Somalia. Endemic poverty, mass unemployment underemployment are basic problems that are preventing the realization of peace and stability in Somalia. The Somalia authorities must provide an enabling environment for the operationalization of the Decent Work Country Programme and must uphold the respect of freedom of association and social dialogue. This is the reason that both workers' and employers' organizations in Somali are fully supporting the Global Deal initiative as a unique platform for social dialogue, decent work and inclusive growth. The status quo with union leaders and activists hounded and denied their legitimate right and space is unacceptable. Indeed, we expect our Government to encourage and empower trade unionist to help with the peace process. Mr Chair, the time is right for legitimate intervention. In line with the ILO's principles and standards, all draconian degrees and laws that have infringed upon workers' and unionists' rights in Somalia should be repealed from our statute books. I am thoroughly convinced that working together between trade unions, Government and employers is irrefutable, the path to us achieving our shared developmental aspirations. I thank you very much.

Employer (Philippines)

Thank you Mr President and fellow delegates to the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference and friends present. Good morning to you all. The Director-General's report on Women at Work and the push for equality is a rude awakening for all of us in this august Assembly. It is also a cause for soul-searching and even collective remorse as we struggle to answer the Director-General's provocative question. Why is the world of work unfair to women? It is a not a pretty picture that we see in the report. Empirical evidence as reported by international organizations, including the ILO and the World Bank, assume that, and I quote, "There has been little change in outcomes for women on the ground in the past 15 years or so, despite advances in laws and policies." Why is this so? Why has the favourable environment in terms of law and policy been largely ineffective in pushing the frontiers of gender equality and fairness in the world of work. In the Philippines particularly, there are existing laws that penalize sexual harassment and violence against women. The private sector for its part, like Zonta International, has waged a relentless campaign on anti-violence against women and pursued its core advocacy of women empowerment in all levels of society. The report says that in the Asia-Pacific region, where I come from, women at work have either dropped or stagnated. The formidable challenges to equality among men and women continue to the present, even after decades of studies and programmes have been undertaken to push equality and a fair deal for all women at work. Thus, women workers continue to receive less pay than men for work of equal value. This issue has spread across a wide area of work, from the entertainment industry to other service sectors of the economy. Women are most likely the victims of violence and sexual harassment in the workplace. Their suffering in silence has finally erupted into a worldwide phenomenon that saw them come out in the open and denounce the perpetrators of these unlawful acts. These protests materialized in many countries, like little bonfires of rebellion igniting the sky in many places. The insensitive picture of inequality as it impacts against women at work remains in many parts of the world. Name them, they are there. Casual employment and paid domestic work, discrimination in the preference for high-paying positions, stereotyping of work for women, treating them as secondary workers, as caregivers and not as breadwinners. It is therefore a deep sense of lack of achievement that has pushed us to make gender equality as one of the ILO's centenary objectives. In this spirit, there is a need to raise the voice in representation of women in the decision-making processes that govern the enterprise and the workplace. It is imperative to recognize the value of their work and contribution to the economy and to compensate their unique ability to balance family and occupational responsibilities. It is as good a time as any for men to acknowledge that gender equality and fair treatment of women at work is not a women's issue exclusively but also an issue for men as well. After all, and at the end of the day, we come to the unavoidable reality that women are God's best gift to mankind. Thank you for your kind attention.

Government (Seychelles)

President, ladies and gentlemen, a very good morning to you all. It is my honour to be present at this esteemed conference for the first time as the Minister responsible for employment for the Republic of Seychelles. On behalf of the Government of Seychelles, I wish to extend my warm congratulations to the President of the Conference on his election for the 107th International Labour Conference. I am inspired to speak on the Report of the Director-General, Mr Guy Ryder, entitled The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality as gender equality does not only affect individuals but also has implications on the labour market and the economy. Women have always fought for their rights and to be treated equally to men. However, we shall not forget that global gender parity is not yet fully achieved. Do we have to wait another century before we can finally say women have equal decent work opportunities and treatment? Ladies and gentlemen, this conference is a concrete expression of our joint commitment to initiate actions to secure and advance the position of women on the labour market. In this effort, we recognize that globalization has brought about development which has transformed the world of work, and the challenge of gender equality remains relevant. In this regard, I believe the demand for female workers should be viewed as equal with the demand for male workers. Therefore, addressing gender equality at work should start from education, skills development and empowerment programmes that need to be equally promoted and facilitated for both men and women. In doing so this can contribute in reducing discrimination in employment towards females' access to jobs and higher wages. Women often interrupt their education or work due to childbearing or marriage responsibilities. In this context, I also concur that indeed businesses and the society have a pivotal role to provide affordable and proximity childcare and support to parents. Employment family policies should create flexible working arrangements and pathways to resume education after having children. In this manner, women will feel more encouraged and comfortable to join the labour market and take on higher positions without fear of neglect of their family and household activities. Likewise, policies should be cognisant of the men's contributions towards gender equality. Men cannot be excluded from this model. Educating and empowering men are important to improve their understanding in order for caregiver and breadwinner roles to be shared equally. The Director-General's report recognizes that women are more likely to experience sexual harassment and violence at work. Hence, we need to seek for changes in culture and attitude of men so that they appreciate gender equality issues. Ladies and gentlemen, Seychelles has taken various initiatives to achieve gender equality and to protect women in the world of work. Our employment legislation and labour inspection systems are established to protect all workers against any forms of discrimination, sexual harassment and violence. For example, last month the Government increased maternity leave from 14 to 16 weeks and paternity leave from 5 to 10 days. We anticipate that these regulations will enable both parents to equally participate in the early childhood care. We also appreciate the number of women in high decision-making positions has steadily increased over the past years. This reflects our country's continued trust in Seychellois women. Whilst we are satisfied of the insignificant cases of workplace gender discrimination, like many countries, our labour market statistics reveal ongoing challenges. Both our national and youth unemployment rate is predominantly higher amongst women. Additionally, more men than women have higher qualifications and consequently higher earnings. These indicators are guiding my Ministry's strategies for the next five years. I am pleased to announce that Seychelles will be launching the second generation of a Decent Work Country Programme this year, and women's economic empowerment is amongst our key priorities towards achieving the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. We anticipate to develop policies that respond to labour market trends including gender equality. Earlier this year, we received technical support from the ILO for the implementation of the SDG Goal 8, in regards to decent work, of which we plan to collect more data. The commitment of the Government and its social partners towards the cause of gender equality ... [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:42] ... national tripartite constituents of the ILO should work together to create a world of work in which women are respected, represented and have a strong voice, thereby making them economically secure and safe from any forms of ill treatment and discrimination. Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, I thank you. Thank you for bearing with me, Mr President.

Mr Van Wijngaarden

Worker (Netherlands)

Dear colleagues, ladies and gentlemen, the Dutch Workers' delegation to the 107th ILC welcomes the Report of the Director-General on Women at Work. The report contains a clear analysis of the unequal labour market position of women, where women are still, on average, paid less as men and are overrepresented in flexible and precarious work. Also, the report gives important insights into the mechanisms behind persistent inequality. Men and women are still not equally regarded as caregivers, resulting in women having to juggle paid work and care responsibilities. Last Tuesday, we had a discussion on working times where we spoke on the importance of adjustment of working times to achieve a better division of care tasks between men and women. With care responsibilities predominately on their shoulders and overrepresented in flexible employment, this results in a higher occurrence of stress-related diseases among women. Male dominated occupations are still higher valued and better paid, resulting in a wage gap between men and women. Even for men and women in the same job, there is a wage gap and it is concerning that mothers are considered less ambitious and less available for work while the reverse applies to fathers. The Director-General makes a strong and often overlooked point that men, too, need to be emancipated from long working days. Across the globe the labour market position of women is still not equal to men's. Figures show that the labour market participation of Dutch men was 75 per cent in 2016, while 65 per cent for women. While Dutch women are now more often in higher educational tracks, from the age of 30, their employment rate starts to lag behind that of men. This is because Dutch women often start working less or stop working altogether when they have children. Relating to this is discrimination in case of pregnancy. Dutch women often report that their contract is not extended due to the fact that they are pregnant. Three-quarters of Dutch women work part time and the share of women in senior positions is only 25 per cent. Accessible care facilities are often a cause for this, not only for childcare, but also for elderly and family care, in which women are overrepresented. The Dutch unions therefore strongly support the first building block to reach equality set out by the Director-General, the new care economy. Women are overrepresented in small and precarious jobs, leading to a lack of economic independence. There is a link between a lack of economic independence and the situation of social unsafety for women. If women are stuck in a dependant relationship, this hinders their participation in the labour market. Conversely, it is easier for women that are economically independent to get out of a violent relationship. We know that women disproportionately experience violence and harassment in the workplace. 2018 is the year when combating violence at the work floor is an important issue during the International Labour Conference. The Dutch trade unions strongly support an ILO Convention to end violence and harassment at the workplace because there is still not a law, at the international level, that sets a baseline for taking action to eradicate violence and harassment in the world of work. I would like to end this speech by stating that trade unions in the Netherlands welcome the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers in the Arab countries. They very much regret that there is no noticeable improvement in the situation of Palestinian workers. They welcome the initiative of the ILO to promote decent work for these workers. Thank you for your kind attention.

Government (Kiribati)

It gives me great pleasure to address you all at this very important conference. Mr President, Vice-President, Director-General, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, greetings to you all from Kiribas, kam na bane ni Mauri. At the outset, I wish to take this opportunity to extend congratulations to you, Mr President, on your new appointment as Chair, with no doubt that under your able leadership will make this year's conference the most effective, inclusive and truthful to all. It would be remiss of me not to acknowledge the hard work of the ILO, the hard work, dedication and commitment demonstrated by the Director-General and his staff, who have worked tirelessly in fulfilling the role of the ILO. Kiribas wish to thank the Director-General and his staff for their commendable efforts and especially for the Director-General's report on the ILO programme implementation for 2016-2017. Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, at this juncture, I wish to share ongoing developments and reforms that are being implemented in Kiribas and to highlight the challenges that Kiribas continues to face, especially in complying to its international obligations to promote social justice through decent work in the working world. The Government recognized the need to work hand in hand with social partners in pursuing its international obligations to promote social justice through decent work in the working world. The Government of Kiribas has initiated its long-term strategy for the next 20 years, known as the KV20, which comprises of the four pillars such as, wealth, peace and security, infrastructure and governance. Kiribas paid attention to the four pillars of peace and work which are the four strategic objectives of ILO, which resulted in the introduction and passing of new laws in 2015, with further recent amendments made to strengthen enforcement of these laws which are the Occupational Safety and Health Act, and the Employment and Industrial Relations Code Act. Kiribas continued to struggle with high youth unemployment rate which stands at 54 per cent from the working age data in 2015. We acknowledged the continued support from Australia through the Seasonal Worker Programme and Northern Australia Worker Pilot Programme, and New Zealand through the Recognized Seasonal Employers for employment opportunities to our unemployed youths. Our task at this august meeting is not a simple one. We are gathered here to share and exchange our experiences and most importantly to make important decisions that will affect the future of the International Labour Organization and the future of humanity in the world of work. Excellences, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, with these few words I wish you all the best with our traditional blessings from the people and Government of Kiribas of Te Mauri, Te Raoi ao Te Tabomoa, meaning good health, peace and prosperity in your very important undertakings for your people, your governments, your organizations you represent and your country. I wish you all a safe journey back to your respective countries and may God bless you all. Thank you.

---

Ms Teo

Government (Singapore)

Distinguished guests and delegates, Singapore fully supports the call by the ILO to strive towards a future of work with full equality for men and women. Women are important contributors to Singapore. For the better part of our early history, women's contributions was mainly domestic. However, by the turn of the twentieth century, women began to be active outside the homes, to take up roles as teachers, social workers, nurses and even doctors. There were many firsts from our first female Olympian in 1952 to our first female Air Force pilot in 1979, first female Supreme Court judge in 1994 and first female president just last year. Today, it is much harder for any woman to be first in this or that in Singapore. That shows how far we have come. Today, half of our university graduates are women. Women continue to contribute actively to the economy. Our female employment rate has improved steadily, from 64 per cent in 2007 it rose to 72 per cent in 2017. In terms of full-time employment, we are ranked sixth compared to 35 OECD countries. Women are also better recognized through our pay levels. In 2017, for those in full-time employment, the gender pay gap narrowed to 9 per cent, placing us tenth compared to 35 OECD countries. The progress of women has led to changes in our social fabric. Singlehood in Singapore has become acceptable and continues to rise. As with most fast developing countries, our total fertility rate has fallen below replacement level since 1977, in spite of our women's strong desire still to form families. Today's generation of younger women have more opportunities to excel in their chosen fields, but it is less likely that their parents can help care for their children. The challenge has therefore shifted from a lack of opportunities in the workplace to a lack of support at home. As a society, our firm belief is that women in Singapore should be able to pursue what is important to them, be it career or family or both, without having to choose between one or the other. Therefore, the Singapore Government will do what we can to empower women through choice, and to do so we must heed the call of the ILO and go beyond business as usual. First we are providing more care facilities to empower more women to choose to work. Over the past five years Singapore has increased preschool capacity by 50 per cent. Over the next five years the number of childcare places will double and become accessible to all. Second, we are strengthening women's control over their time by helping even more employers offer flexible work arrangements. In 2016, 77 per cent offer at least one form of flexible work arrangement, compared with 65 per cent five years ago. Because of our strong tripartism, the tripartite partners have also innovated and created the tripartite standards to further drive adoption of flexible work arrangements. Third, we have strengthened our laws against harassment, including violence and harassment at work. We launched a tripartite advisory on managing workplace harassment to guide employers to foster workplace environments where harassment is not tolerated. In closing, Singapore fully supports the ILO's call to strive towards a future of work with full equality of opportunity for women and men. There is much more we can do. We will continue to strengthen our efforts to empower our women through choice. Thank you very much.

Government (China)

Distinguished Chairperson, ladies and gentlemen, good morning. Reducing gender gaps in the labour market to ensure women's access to full and quality employment is a demanding task facing all countries around the world. The Chinese Government praises the DG's report, appreciates that the ILO included Women at Work as one of its Centenary Initiatives and supports the international communities to conduct more targeted actions on this topic. The Chinese Government has made gender equality one of its basic national policies and attaches great importance to women's employment. Opportunities of decent work for women keep increasing and the employment quality keeps improving. First, the protection system for women workers keeps being perfected. Trying to make gender equality one of its basic national policies, law of the People's Republic of China on the protection of rights and interests of women and special rules on the labour protection of female employees explicitly stated the protection of women's specific rights and interests. The Chinese Government consecutively published three issues of China national programme for women's development, explicitly identified concrete goals and measures of labour unemployment social protection for security for women. China has set up a national working committee on children and women and a state council to coordinate and promote related government agencies to implement laws, regulations, policies on children and women to promote work on children and women, all about systems and institutions play important role in the protection of women workers' rights and interests. Second, employment quality and structure for women keeps improving, trying to uphold the underlying principle of pursuing progress while ensuring stability, focusing on innovation and improvement of economic macro-controls so as to ensure the economic performed within the proper range, the continuous economic development creating more jobs with high quality for women. Third, the coverage of a social security for women keeps expanding. The Chinese Government attaches great importance to ensuring various kinds of social protection for women workers. Compared with 2010, in 2017 the proportion of women participating in various kinds of social insurance increased greatly and was higher than the national average increase during the same period. The Chinese are now making efforts in securing a decisive victory in building a model [vgr INAUDIBLE 3:30] society in all respects. We will adhere to the people centre development, vigorously protect the legitimate rights and interests of women, optimize the development and environment for women, and improve for their social status so they can have equal rights to reform and development. Mr Chairperson, ladies and gentlemen, gender equality is an essential prerequisite to realize sustainable development and ensure decent work. Governments of all countries should take comprehensive measures in accordance with national conditions to continuously push forward the goals of gender equality. Therefore, I have the following suggestions. First: continue to expand employment channels for women; eliminate gender discrimination; promote women's employment in emerging industries and decent jobs and ensure women's access to equal employment opportunities; improve supporting policies for entrepreneurship to support and assist women with their entrepreneurial activities; implement more proactive employment policies and strengthen employment assistance to women with difficulties in getting employed. Second: keep strengthening education and training for women; improve talent cultivation, evaluation and incentive policies in vocational education and training for women and enhance the proportion of women amongst skilled workers; break down prejudice against women in all industries and vocations. Third: continue to safeguard legal labour rights and interests for women workers; improve and implement laws and policies conducive to gender equality by including the mindset of gender equality into public policy-making; regulate the employment practices of enterprises; solve cases of violation of women's workers' rights and interests in accordance with law; and a crackdown on violence and harassment at the workplace. The Chinese Government firmly supports the ILO International Labour Conference to adopt Conventions and Recommendations. Ladies and gentlemen, Mr Chairman, the Chinese Government stands ready to cooperate closely with [vgr international committees and make joint efforts. Thank you very much.

Mr Leeyavanija

Employer (Thailand)

Mr President, on behalf of Thai employers, I would like to take this opportunity to express about The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality. The world of work is unfair for women for a long time. Since men solely looks after for their household living costs from the past till now. In the past 20 years, and up until now, there is seriously promoted gender equality, but the status of women in each region is not equal. That may be due to the financial crisis spreading all over the world, and soon I believe that the digital economy era will bring new innovations and will make women more equal in the workplace. The time, money and agency conundrum, all these problems will gradually disappear when man turns to help women to do housework and by making awareness to men. Several ILO Conventions, which is about women are still inequality, but they were on the right way. We can see the development in this issue. Fair evaluation of women's work should be enacted as a mechanism for regulating job evaluation and providing fair compensation, as well as promoting the presence and representation of women must be a law. It's gratifying to issue a new labour standard to eliminate women's oppression in the next year's conference. I would like to commend this report for the achievement of gender equality, strengthen women, terminate discrimination and eliminate all forms of violence against women and the participation of women in all occasions. There are issues that I want to emphasize. Although there are new mechanisms to promote the status and role of women, which included future plans, it also emphasizes the acceptance of women in all situations. The obvious thing is in our dimensions of the general situation. Women also have to work twice as hard as men, both at home and at work to earn for a living. For Thailand, the mechanism has continued to develop. For example, an employer should treat both men and women workers equally in employment. Bachelor's degree graduation worker in Thailand are mainly women, which is more than men about 900,000 workers. This information reflects that woman executive is not less than man. In the past four years, our country is under the administration of the military government. Many laws have been enacted women to represent both the employee and employer in the tripartite commission, which is a good thing to admire. To be better, the military government should use their existing powers to amend the law regarding the execution of the tripartite commission to be more democracy. Thank you very much.

Ms Emilianidou

Government (Cyprus)

Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, it is an honour for me to address the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Cyprus. Since its creation, the ILO has proved to be one of the leading international organizations in terms of ensuring gender equality and non-discrimination in the world of work. With the Women at Work initiative, the ILO upholds and extends its effort, its credibility and authority on gender equality issues. Gender equality and women empowerment rank high on the national agenda of Cyprus, and equality opportunities are a fundamental priority of our employment policy. In this regard, Cyprus has made significant progress in the promotion of gender equality and the empowerment of women during the recent years and has put in place the necessary legal and public policy framework to effectively deal with the issues of gender discrimination. We formulated new policies in the field of employment, social inclusion, education, health, violence against women, trafficking in human beings and equal opportunities in public and political life. The employment of women in Cyprus is steadily rising. The aim of the Government is to increase the participation of women in the workforce by active measures. At the same time, Cyprus increased the production period against termination of employment for pregnant women. We have also introduced paid paternity leave. We believe that work-life balance policies help to increase women's ability to take part in the labour market and reduce the unequal share of paid work and unpaid care work between women and men. We have also established the Gender Equality Committee in Employment and Vocational Training to further enhance gender equality. A code on preventing and dealing with sexual harassment for the public and the private sector has already been concluded. The reduction of the gender pay gap is also central to our policies. The implementation of a broad mix of measures has contributed to the considerable decrease of the gender pay gap. The Government strongly condemns all forms of violence against women and promotes measures to maximize their protection. The ratification in November 2017 of the Istanbul Convention is a step that can make a substantial contribution to the development of an integrated legal framework and necessary policies to protect and empower victims of all forms of violence. Mr President, we welcome the Director-General's commitment to take action against persisting inequalities in several critical areas, especially in employment. We believe that the complex nature of the issue of achieving equal opportunities and empowering of women requires an integrated approach. A results-based management approach of the ILO Action Plan 2018-2021 will further enhance its effective implementation. Increased transparency and efficiency and annual monitoring of the progress on targets with a report into UN Women is of a great importance. We are convinced that the Women at Work initiative is very much needed. We urge the ILO and its constituents for a strong commitment and targeted efforts to promote gender equality. We call on the ILO to increase efforts and funding, where necessary, and supporting existing and new measures and strategies accordingly. Thank you very much.

Mr Maiato

Government (Angola)

Your Excellency and President of the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. Your Excellency the President of the Governing Body of the ILO and Your Excellency Sir Guy Ryder, Director-General of the ILO, delegates, ladies and gentlemen. Allow me, on behalf of the Angolan Government, on behalf of the government accompanying me, and for myself, to congratulate the President on his election as President of the 107th Session of this Conference, and to congratulate His Excellency Mr Guy Ryder on the successful management of the business of the International Labour Office. Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, the Angolan State has accepted as one of the foundations of development of our country a trust in individual human beings in all of their different aspects and has been defining policies aiming to promote educational structures which will make it possible to create and increase the status of a qualified workforce for the reconstruction and development of the country. As we understand that the search for decent work is intimately linked to one of the pillars of development set out by the Angolan Government, which aims to stimulate the development of human capital and the promotion of qualified and paid work through the promotion of the sectors of agriculture industry and the other key sectors for the diversification of the Angolan economy. These initiatives are founded on a basis of sustainable development, the reaffirmation of social justice and the wellbeing of families, providing incentives for tripartite social dialogue and collective bargaining with a view to promoting an environment for decent high-quality work. And in this sense, the Angolan Government very recently started a programme on the harmonization of legal labour relationships, one of whose basic presuppositions is the need for tripartite social dialogue. Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, in the Constitution of the republic of agriculture, the right to work is set out as a fundamental right, and thus the promotion of policy for the fomentation of employment is one of the priorities of the Angolan Government. Given that, we have been promoting activities aiming to provide incentives for the spirit of creativity and private initiative through support to entrepreneurships and self-employment with a view to mitigating the effects of the economic crisis. And to translate these objectives into specific terms, the country has a total of 635 centres of professional and vocational training providing 139 different training courses, and over the legislative period 2012 to 2017, they trained 225,912 citizens. At the same time, 886,440 new jobs were created, and there was a particularly strong development in sectors linked to the real economy. President, ladies and gentlemen, the challenges of today require that all those concerned, the Government, employers, workers and civil society, must be committed to the conception and implementation of policies which will provide decent work to everyone, every citizen living in our country. Given that, the Angolan Government has approved a national development plan for 2017 to 2022 and a programme for support for production, diversification of exports and substitution of imports, called PRODESI, whose implementation will have a significant impact in the development of human capital and in the creation of new jobs, thus contributing to the macroeconomic stability of our country. Distinguished President, in line with the extension of social protection to workers in the informal sector, the Angolan Government has approved a regulation on the legal employment relationship and the right to social security of domestic workers in conformity with ILO Conventions, and it's estimated in the next few years this could lead to more than 350,000 domestic workers being included in the social security regime, most of them women. As far as implementation of ILO policies is concerned, in the area of labour and social security, Angola has been adapting its legislation, bearing in mind the guidelines of this organization. And to that effect, work is underway on the technicalities of the ratification of a number of Conventions where we could particularly pick out Convention 144 on tripartite consultation. I wish everyone here every success in their work. Thank you very much for listening.

Government (Luxembourg)

Mr Chairperson, first of all, allow me to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of this conference. In 2016, you hosted a very important meeting in Jordan, a meeting of the Ministers of Labour for the Union of the Mediterranean. This highlighted the need for deep strength and cooperation in work, employment and social issues. Delegates, Excellencies, Mr Chairperson, our annual conference is in the run up to the centenary of this organization which has made a very special contribution to multilateralism. It does not only bring together States, it also involves social partners. Therefore, it is a pillar of the multilateral system and recognizes the critical role of our civil society. I cannot but endorse the words pronounced by the Director-General at the beginning of this conference. Multilateralism is being disputed all over the world. People are returning to nationalism, protectionism and rejecting international cooperation, perhaps giving way to brutal power politics. Yes. In fact, what we're seeing is a new brutalism. People are rejecting international agreements, blindly denying evidence with total disregard for the disastrous consequences. For example, denying the evidence of climate change. Our organization brings together representatives of our civil societies, employers' organizations and workers' organizations. Therefore, we need to underline the fact that unilateral action and the rejection of international rules make our world a more dangerous place. This will prevent us from solving the main problems that we face, such as poverty, underdevelopment, unemployment, social injustice and the imbalances that we're seeing in our natural environment. In this world, which is in the throes of change, we can build on the knowledge that we have accrued over the decades here in this organization. Now we need to adapt them and develop them further. I would also like to commend the initiative called Global Deal launched by the Swedish Prime Minister with the support of the ILO and the OECD. This initiative which has already submitted its first report is aimed at promoting social dialogue and partnerships. We must make sure that we give globalization a real social dimension. Luxembourg is dedicated to tripartism and will soon join that initiative, and we've already been supporting it a great deal so far. We are at the heart of a new technological revolution which requires social innovation if we want it to be useful to mankind. This is the meaning of the future of work that the Global Commission will present next year. We hope that, based on this report, we will be able to negotiate new Conventions which will support the world of work using these platforms and using new economic models all over the world. The ILO has a new greater role when it comes to dealing with technologies which are transforming the world of work and creating new forms of work. Of course, there are new opportunities, and we need to seize these, but there are also many difficulties. There are precarious situations and things becoming more polarized. Therefore, there will be people who lose out, and we must make sure we do not leave them behind. My country is very focused on these new technologies, and we're using them to modernize our economy, make it more sustainable. We're also investing in skills of workers and trying to promote their careers. We're providing continuing education and training, and these are elements which can drive technological change and make it more inclusive. This new technological revolution needs to be used to benefit as many people as possible and not deepen inequalities in our society. We need to make the world of work fairer, more equitable and more inclusive. This also means we need to rigorously combat all forms of discrimination and harassment and violence at work. Women still face discrimination when it comes to salaries and access to certain jobs. They are the main victims of harassment and sometimes even worse, as we have learned quite recently. My country prioritizes non-discrimination and equality of opportunities. The gender pay gap in Luxembourg is 5.4 per cent. It is one of the lowest in Europe. It has been falling but we want it to disappear completely. Therefore, we have adopted a law which penalizes all gender pay gaps. Based on that, we work on the principle of equal pay for equal work, and we need to make this a reality because it is not so yet. We need to ensure that we step up efforts to achieve this, and the ILO is the ideal framework in which to do this. We are fully committed to the Women at Work initiative and the new push for equality. I would like to conclude by highlighting the importance of politics focused on decent work and decent employment. Millions of workers do not have decent working conditions or salaries that allow them to live a decent life. Only decent work will allow them to meet their basic needs in line with the SDGs. This needs to remain at the centre of our policies and all of our action to work towards social justice, and we must make sure that we work towards achieving those objectives. Thank you.

Worker (Russian Federation)

Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, comrades, we know from the United Nations Secretary-General António Guterres' report on progress towards the Sustainable Development Goals that 760 million people in the world continue to live below the poverty line. Now, though poverty may not be a sin for an individual person, for any community of people, poverty is stark evidence of the economic and moral failings of that society. In this connection, we fully share the view of the ILO's Director-General, Guy Ryder, that globally the most glaring climb against social justice remains discrimination against women in the world of work. That we must put an end to poverty and give billions of people access to means of subsistence is beyond question, but it is equally unquestionable that all people, men and women alike, have the right to fulfil their potential in conditions of equality and dignity. This was already proclaimed last century in the ILO's Philadelphia Declaration which underscores the inalienable right of workers to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development. Today, this is reflected in the 70 Sustainable Development Goals of the United Nations, and it is no coincidence that SDG8 sets the goal of achieving gender equality and equal pay for equal work by 2030. Poverty is multidimensional. Alongside its material components are indicators of social degradation. They transpire in inadequate labour and employment conditions, in a lack of access to education and healthcare, and poor living conditions. Poverty is a lot more than simply not having enough money. Poverty is linked to the alienation of people from society, from employment and from the results of employment. Poverty is a synonym of injustice, and the material and social imperatives here are very closely intertwined. The Director-General's report rightly underscores that the ILO's mandate includes the idea that work should be an act of self-fulfilment and the full realization of individual and effective goals. It is not for nothing that the ILO is called the 'social consciousness' of the United Nations. ILO's standards are the basis for achieving all of the end goals, and that is why any attempt to weaken the ILO's body of standards and its tried and tested supervisory mechanism constitute yet another case of poverty, the impoverishment of member States political will and the wretched selfishness of a number of employers. Poverty limits access for a significant part of the population to development resources such as highly paid jobs, good quality education and healthcare, and the successful participation in society of young people and women. Low levels of revenue for many families and the polarization of income are creating social divisions within society, hampering the successful development of a country. The newly re-elected President of Russia underscored that the main thrust of his work during this new term in office will be to fight against poverty and social stratification. We welcome this and will help put it into practice. Today, Russia's trade unions are fighting for the development of human potential as the main driver of economic growth and for creating an enabling environment for the self-realization of citizens and for higher wages and rooting out the causes of poverty. The most effective way of solving problems in the social and labour relations can only work in a framework of social partnership. Alongside our social partners, we will strive for modernizing the economy, diversifying its structures and transitioning towards an innovative model of development. The 20th anniversary of the ILO's Declaration on the Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, which we are celebrating this week, should give fresh momentum to the struggle for social justice, equal rights and the social dignity of workers in the world. I suggest adopting a specific instrument, so an ILO Recommendation or Resolution, calling for equal pay for equal work between men and women. Overcoming the 20 per cent pay gap between men and women for equal work will help increase the purchasing power and demand of our population. This, in turn, would give a major boost to global development through the economic cycle of supply and demand. It is only by achieving social justice that we will solve the issues linked to economic well-being and that is the main task of the ILO on the eve of its 100th anniversary. Thank you for your attention.

Government (Brunei Darussalam)

Mr President and distinguished delegates, first and foremost, I would like to take this opportunity to convey my congratulations to His Excellency Mr Samir Murad on his election as President of the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. Mr President, we are pleased that this agenda surrounds several crucial yet interrelated items. It has been five years since constituents have convened to discuss the topic of social dialogue under the follow ups of the 1998 and 2008 Declarations, and this year's 2018 report by the ILO brings into focus the complementarity of effective labour law reforms as well as dispute and mediation approaches in managing the reality of employer employee interactions. The well-being and safety of workers and the success of enterprise can only be achieved when concerted efforts are made to provide clear and productive avenues for positive consultations and the resolution practices. In the same regard, I recall the foresight of the Governing Body in placing a standard setting discussion on violence against women and men in the world of work on this year's conference agenda in light of the goals and targets of the 2030 Agenda for sustainable development. We are pleased to know that ILO always pursuing the issue in the fullest extent of their potential. Brunei Darussalam takes a serious view of violence and harassment in any work-related places and recognizes the negative impact it has on the well-being of workers as well as business and productivity. We therefore have established strict laws against any immoral behaviour and sexual harassment at the workplace, especially towards women in work. And we also provide confidential counselling services for the victims of sexual harassment to overcome the psychological trauma. Mr President, focus on unacceptable working conditions for women has been in the forefront of the ILO agenda since 1919, and as the Report of the Director-General on the Women at Work initiative highlights, the greatest challenges faced by women today are the striking of balance between work and family as well as access to affordable care in the context of national social security system. Twenty-eight per cent of the total number of employees in Brunei Darussalam's private sector are women. Fifty-four per cent of Brunei Darussalam's civil service are composed of women, where today women hold highly ranked positions in the Government. The voices and perspective of women in the context of youth affairs and apprenticeships also resound prominently in Brunei Darussalam's legislative council. I am proud to share that in 2011 Brunei Darussalam has increased the minimum maternity leave entitlement for working mothers from 9 weeks to 15 weeks. Conscientious policy initiatives such as these provide opportunities for organizations to be progressive in the human resource practices and allow for women to further optimize their pertinent roles at work and at home. It is imperative that the world of work must adapt in accord to the needs of women who are, by themselves, undeniable principle contributors and integral factors in the formal labour markets. Mr President, I would like to take this further opportunity to commend the extensive Report of the Director-General on the ILO's programmes of implementation for 2016-2017, as well as the permanent support by the International Labour Organization on Vientiane Declaration on Transition from Informal Employment to Formal Employment towards Decent Work Promotion which was adopted by ASEAN Heads of State during the 28th and 29th ASEAN Summits in Vientiane in 2016. On behalf of my delegation, I would like to applaud the ILO's commitment in the overall pursuit of a fair, equitable and harmonious world of work. I am confident that the bone fide contribution of the organization to date will continue to bolster its relevance and mandate as an important factor in the UN development system, and we look forward to an auspicious conference. Thank you very much, Mr President.

Ms Liew

Worker (Singapore)

Mr President, delegates. The DG's comprehensive report is a timely reminder that much more work needs to be done to improve the conditions in the world of work for women. The ILO and its tripartite partners must act more effectively and urgently to deliver gender equality. Delivering gender equality is not just about social justice, it also makes strong economic sense. The reports by the McKinsey Global Institute in April this year titled The power of parity: Advancing women's equality in Asia Pacific projected that advancing gender equality in countries in the region could add US$4.5 trillion to their collective GDP annually by 2025, a 12 per cent increase over a business as usual GDP trajectory. This additional GDP will be equivalent to adding an economy the combined size of Germany and Austria each year. Singapore female literacy rate is over 95 per cent, and we promote equal remuneration as their male counterparts. As a testimony, in Singapore's progress on women's agenda, we are very proud to share that one of our Singapore national trades union congress, the NTUC's former Deputy Secretary-General and Workers' delegate Madam Halimah Yacob, many of you here may know her, was elected as Singapore's first female president. And I'm also glad that the IOC, for the first time, has placed on its agenda to end the violence and harassment in the world of work, and this has been very challenging, and I look forward to a positive outcome. Singapore's tripartite partners do not condone sexual harassment nor bullying in the workplace. With close to a million workers represented by the NTUC, and half of whom are female workers and members, unions play a very important role partnering employers to facilitate a harassment free, violence free workplace. The partnership is further reinforced by the 2014 Protection from Harassment Act that provides a legal framework for standards on socially acceptable range of behaviour within and outside the workplace. The tripartite partners have also jointly issued a Tripartite Advisory on Managing Workplace Harassment. The Advisory promotes and encourages employers to put in place preventative measures and recommends proactive management and remedial actions for harassment occurring in the workplace. Mr President, Singapore has seen the rise in the employment rate of women reaching 72 per cent in 2017, women where their age ranged between 25 to 64. This encouraging trend must be sustained by progressive workplace practices and policies to retain female talents. There have been immense efforts by the tripartite partners to promote and encourage organizations to adopt effective workplace strategies, including flexible work arrangement, FWA. Through the Work-Life Grant under the WorkPro Scheme, from the Government funding schemes introduced in 2013, NTUC has assisted more than 200 companies to implement FWA, and we have benefited more than 10,000 employees of both genders. To further acknowledge the positive impact that FWA has in supporting working mothers and caregivers, a new set of tripartite standards on FWA was launched in 2017, where adopters will further differentiate themselves as employers of choice. While the NTUC is happy to note that there has been progress made in the push of gender equality, there remains much more work that needs to be done. Advancement in technology has significantly impacted the world of work and with better infrastructure and equipment a new flexi-workforce is on the rise. NTUC has started the dialogue with the Government on how to help our employers to learn to manage the flexi-workforce more effectively as well as to offer more options of FWAs to cater for the varied needs of the workforce, including job sharing as a more accessible form of FWAs for working mothers. Mr President, in conclusion, I wish the conference a success and look forward to the delegates coming together to share ideas, realizing the ILOs Women at Work initiative. Thank you.

Government (Bulgaria)

Dear Mr President, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen. Thank you for giving me the opportunity to join the discussion on the report on The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality. We support the Director-General's opinion that now, in the eve of the ILO's centenary, it's the right moment for a renewed push for gender equality at work. With its Centenary Initiatives, Women at Work initiative and as well the Future of Work initiative, the ILO upholds and extends its credibility and authority on gender equality issues. During its 100 years of existence, the ILO has conducted a great deal of work in support of women and gender equality of which it can be proud and which will remain relevant in the years to come. Being the voice of the EU during the International Labour Conference, Bulgaria, as the President of the EU Council, underlines that gender equality and women empowerment rank very high on the EU agenda. The provision of equal opportunities for women and men, including closing the gender pay gap, is crucial for the realization of the objectives and strengthening the Europe 2020 Strategy. Gender equality is also a key issue in the context of the European Pillar of Social Rights and the 2018 European Economic Governance annual cycle. Bulgaria is also fully committed to the common goal of ensuring gender equality, empowerment and well-being of women and girls, and we have worked actively towards its realization during our presidency. Creating equal opportunities, non-discrimination and women's empowerment rank high on our presidency programme, especially with regards to our priority, future at work. Bulgaria has identified women in the digital world as an important gender equality topic during our presidency. According to recent Eurostat data, Bulgaria has leading positions in the EU in terms of women's representation in the digital economy, and we will continue to work towards enabling more women and girls to take up professional and leadership roles in the ICT industry. This topic ranks high on the agenda also with regards to overcoming the gender stereotypes. The increasing participation of women in a predominately male sector is indicative for the social progress towards gender equality. An evaluation of the European Institute on gender equality shows that the share of women employed in the information and communication technology sector is 16.7 per cent in European level. At the same time, the percentage of women in the sector in Bulgaria is the highest among all European countries, approximately 30 per cent. Data also shows that women employed in the ICT field are better paid in comparison to other sectors. The Bulgarian Government places a special focus on the development of measures for equal participation of women and men in the labour market, better reconciliation of professional and family life, access to vocational training and qualification, equal pay for equal work. The Law on Equality between Women and Men regulates the implementation of the state policy on equality between women and men. It achieves better alignment of the national legislation with the EU standards and the international legal acts in the field of equality between women and men, to which Bulgaria is a party. An important element of the gender equality policy is the National Strategy for Promoting the Equality between Women and Men till 2020. The main purpose of which is to create guarantees for equal treatment, equal access to the social resources and equal participation in decision-making of women and men. At a national level, we also pursue a well-managed policy for family support and reconciliation of private and professional life. Work-life balance policies can help reduce the gender pay gap. Investing in care facilities and in adequate family support and parental leave for both women and men contributes to reducing the gender pay gap. With the aim to ensure better reconciliation of professional and family life, a special project under the Operational Programme Human Resources Development is implemented by the Employment Agency, so called 'Parents in employment'. The purpose is to support parents who take care of children to return to work, in case they are employed, or to provide employment through labour mediation services for unemployed and inactive parents. Female workers and employees are entitled to pregnancy and childbirth leave of 410 days for each child. The daily cash benefits for pregnancy and childbirth are 90 per cent of the average daily gross wage or the average daily contributory income. If the mother decides to return to work during that period, she will keep receiving together with her salary 50 per cent of the benefit till the end of this 410 days period. Finally, we reiterate our full support of the Women at Work initiative and urge the tripartite constitutes for a strong commitment and targeted efforts to promote gender equality in the implementation of the ILO Strategic Plan 2018-21 in order to achieve a practical realization of the leaving no one behind concept. Thank you for your attention.

Mr Antoniou

Employer (Cyprus)

Dear Chairperson, I wish to begin my speech by welcoming the Director-General's report regarding ILO's Women at Work initiative. The persisting inequality between men and women is a truth that is hard to swallow. Globally, women are only 70 per cent as likely as men to be in the labour force, earn approximately 20 per cent less than men and are more likely to be the victims of violence and harassment at work. The Director-General's report is a reminder that more needs to be done, and we look forward to evaluating further its findings and recommendations. Ladies and gentlemen, the world of work is changing and it's changing fast. New technologies are eliminating entire industries and new ones are created. Terms such as big data and 3D printing are now part of our vocabulary. Advances in artificial intelligence, automation and robotics, are already transferring beyond recognition the way we work. Boundaries between people, technology and the physical world are becoming increasingly blurred. The ways to grasp the opportunities and maximize the benefits of this development should have been on our agenda and inequality should have been discarded to the dustbin of history a long time ago. Unfortunately, this is not the case as we find ourselves today still discussing issues that are otherwise self-explanatory. In the pursuit for equality, legislating is useful but not sufficient. Businesses need to do more and employer organizations are duty-bound to encourage practices and norms that can breach and eventually eliminate all gaps. This is the moral thing to do. This is the normal thing to do, and at the end of the day, this is the profitable thing to do because equality is the foundation of robust enterprises and the cornerstone of competitive economies. Unless we recognize the problem and transform ourselves, we cannot bring the change we want. Let me tell you as more part of what my federation has been doing during the years. We began by making equality in the workplace one of our top priorities. To that end, we amended our federation's Article of Association, making equality part of our mandate. In 2004, we became the first social partner organization in Cyprus to prepare and disseminate among businesses a model code of practice for the prevention of sexual harassment in the workplace. In 2012, we developed a Gender Equality Certification System as part of a project run by the Ministry of Labour, under which enterprises implementing equal treatment and equal pay principles are certified as equality employers. In 2014, we initiated the Sound Labour Relations Project which is cofounded by the European Union and the Government of Cyprus, through which gender equality at work is actively promoted. In 2016, together with the Cyprus Association of Women, we launched the Women Excellence Award to promote positive role models and challenge stereotypes about women. By actively participating in the fight against inequalities, we consciously make employers part of the solution, and we will continue doing this with all available means, in close cooperation with this office. Distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, there is no doubt that the world of work in our planet, with the invaluable contribution of this institution, is spectacularly better than 100 years ago and it is constantly improving. Nevertheless, in equality between men and women at work is a collective failure that needs to be addressed. Inequality takes different forms in different countries and different expressions in different cultures, but no matter how it is disguised, inequality is equally painful for those suffering its consequences. Let's make ILO's Women at Work initiative a global tool for a global redress of a global mistake. Thank you.

Mr Moestadja

Government (Suriname)

Mr President of the Conference, fellow delegates, ladies and gentlemen. My country is now at the crossroads of fundamental renewal. The Multiannual Development Plan 2017-2021, the Decent Work Agenda and Sustainable Development Goals 2030 are main drivers of the renewal of the labour administration. Always taking tripartite consultations into account, decent employment and an inclusive and protective society are principles of these guidelines. Our aim is to incorporate labour policy in general government policy and we have succeeded. The Vice-President, on behalf of the President of the Republic of Suriname, very specifically mentioned the renewal of the labour legislation in its annual speech to Parliament while the Development Plan also mentions the importance of decent jobs and active labour market policy. Six labour laws have already been approved by Parliament in 2016 and 2017. Another six laws are now pending in Parliament on maternity protection, child labour, dialogue on enterprise level, the National Productivity Centre, employment protection and contract labour. I also mentioned a new occupational safety and health policy which will be submitted to Parliament this year. The ratification of the first labour Protocol was approved by Parliament last week. Suriname identified the child labour Convention 138 in January 2018. A plan of action will follow shortly. A new Minimum Wage Act and decent work and timely legislation have been submitted to the Labour Advisory Board. In the meantime, the Government of Suriname has decided to increase the minimum wage in the context of real economic possibilities. In line with the SDGs, the Decent Work Agenda and our Development Plan on Equality of Treatment Act and a Violence in the World of Work Act were submitted to the Labour Advisory Board after there has been a call from civil society for decades for legislation and policy in this regard. This topic coincides with the agenda of the ILC this year. More labour law reform is planned for this year. The new labour policy will confront our labour inspectorate with an implementation challenge and deficit. We have therefore proposed the ILO to incorporate a strengthening of the inspectorate programme in our new Decent Work Programme. In the coming months a rehabilitation programme will be prepared for the labour inspectorate. The first aim is to step up the basic inspection services and to adequately equip the service. The aim in the near future is to implement the modern labour inspectorate in terms of modern service delivery and incorporation of new skills. The establishment of a labour market information system is also high priority in order to implement an active labour market policy. To promote sustainable livelihoods and decent employment, the Board for Cooperatives was established recently. We realize that the economic downturn had its impact on wages and purchase power. We hope that the gradual improvement in the economy since this year will result in a rehabilitation of purchase power. However, it remains our mission to lift labour policy to the highest echelons of government policy which should be fair to workers and their families. I thank you.

Ms Sarieroglu

Government (Turkey)

Distinguished Minister, distinguished Ministers, at the very outset of my speech, I would like to commend the Director-General for his comprehensive report The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality. As mentioned in the report, the world is far from reaching the very objective of equality at work. Despite global legislative achievements and policies favouring positive discrimination and some progress in terms of equality of women at work the last 15 years, the progress still remains to be quite limited. That is why there is a growing need to support tested policy tools and integrate them into relevant pieces of legislation. Distinguished delegates, in Turkey we developed a multifaceted policy that both protects and prioritizes women, youth and people with disabilities in working life. Within this framework, we realized an increase of approximately nine million people in the labour force during the last decade. As a result of this increase in labour force, in employment figures, we became the most successful among OECD and EU countries. By making more effective use of our resources, we took many outstanding initiatives in order to integrate more women into the labour market and to maintain within, such as childbirth allowance, tax reduction and premium support and employment incentives. Our country is ready to share best practices with other countries. I wanted to underline this. Distinguished delegates, the National Mobilization in Employment campaign, which we initiated in 2017, entered its second phase this year, and within the framework of this campaign in 2017 we created 1.5 million additional jobs. We are extremely proud that this is a success story in parallel with Turkey's 2017 growth rate being 7.4 per cent. We are also pleased to see that our growth is employment friendly and includes all segments of the society. Throughout this period, out of 508,000 people who attended vocational courses and active labour market programmes, 55 per cent were women. Such incentives and other services we provide increase women's participation in the labour market and their involvement in social life. Within this framework, for a period of 18 months, the State will be subsidizing the insurance premiums and taxes of each and every woman employed until 2020. We give support for childcare, and for a period of six months we extend a stipend support and subsidize universal health insurance and the occupation accidents and diseases insurance premiums to all women attending our on-the-job training programmes and vocational training courses in industrial occupations. And 2018 year is announced to be the Year Against Child Labour, and we continue our close dialogue with the ILO on this matter. Distinguished delegates, as you all know we have faced the largest influx of refugees since World War II. Demographic change, challenged quite harshly by the recent crisis in Syria, is one of the most important themes within the discussions on the Future of Work, and this crisis continues to impact our labour markets. Nevertheless, our historical responsibility, our neighbourhood relations and our humanitarian take on this issue prompted us to have an open-door policy towards Syrians under the leadership of our president, Mr Recep Tayyip Erdoğan, and as a result of this policy, we still extend humanitarian aid and support across approximately 4 million people in various fields. To date, we've spent more than US$30 billion to help and assist those under temporary protection. We take pride in being the most generous country in the world as for the humanitarian aid we provided, particularly to the refugees in our country as well as to others all around the world. However, we expect the international community to do more for the sake of humanity in terms of responsibility and burden sharing. Another important topic is the stance of the Director-General vis-à-vis the occupied Arab territories. As he pointedly suggested, putting an end to unfavourable conditions, settling conflicts in an expeditious manner and instilling peace will have a positive impact on working life. As Turkey, we wholeheartedly support this position. There is the humanitarian tragedy out there in Palestine. Turkey believes that it is high time we said no to such humanitarian tragedies on international platforms, took constructive and concrete steps and brought on international solutions. Despite the UN resolution calling on all states to refrain from the establishment of the diplomatic missions in Jerusalem, some countries are still moving their embassies to Jerusalem. This attitude does not coincide with the desired attitude I've previously explained. Existence of this problem for more than half a century does serious harm to the concept of justice. Decisions of these countries are null and void to us. There is an obvious need for peace and ... [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:40] ... the international community must be persistent to achieve it. With these words, I wish you all a successful conference yielding fruitful results for all. Thank you very much.

Ms Dalli

Government (Malta)

Distinguished guests, good morning. Malta acknowledges the work carried out by the ILO since 1919, and throughout the years, in the field of equality at work. It has not only raised the principle of equality but has also set standards that can guide us in our initiatives to ensure that our labour markets do not discriminate against women. The Women at Work Centenary Initiative underlines the reality that we still have a long way ahead. It also underlines the need for countries to adopt new approaches that aim at weakening the deeply rooted factors hindering the achievement of equality in our society today. Figures released by Eurostat show that while Malta has one of the EU's best male employment rates with 83.1 per cent of men aged between 20 and 64 in work, just 55.5 per cent of women within that age range are employed. We have had an increase in the female participation rate in Malta as a result of a number of initiatives, which have led to the economic success of the island and one of the lowest unemployment rates in Europe and have created a labour market that embraces female participation. Several initiatives such as universal childcare, breakfast clubs for schoolchildren, enhanced family-friendly measures, an increase in several leave entitlements, such as maternity leave and IVF leave, have all contributed towards an environment that helps families to achieve a balance between the world of work and family responsibilities. On the other hand, the introduction of the maternity leave fund from which employers recover salaries paid during maternity leave encourages employers to hire all employees irrespective of gender, thus strengthening equality in recruitment. The gender pay gap is an issue we are currently working on in order to further mitigate the democratic deficit in employment. Another encouraging statistic, also as a result of Government action, is with respect to headship positions within the public service. Statistics gathered recently have shown that their presentation of women in headship positions in the public service today stands at 30.3 per cent, a substantial increase from a few years ago. In the coming months, throughout amendments to labour legislation, the Maltese Government will continue in its work to eliminate existing deficiencies in the achievement of full equality. Moreover, every employer will soon be obliged to have a written and freely accessible family-friendly policy in place. We are also working on an eventual ratification of the Domestic Workers Convention in order to build upon the existing national law protecting domestic workers. The achievements I have just mentioned rested on effective social dialogue. The strengthening of social dialogue in Malta has been the backbone of a relatively calm industrial relations climate. Discussion with social partners and civil society is an ongoing process of our open government approach. Just last year a national agreement on the minimum wage was reached between the Government, the opposition and the social partners. The measures agreed upon are purposely designed to preserve wage relativities and industrial relations while addressing social inequalities. In Malta, diversity and tripartite consultations achieved through consultation structures such as the Employment Relations Board and the Malta Council for Economic and Social Development, together with the involvement of civil society. I am very pleased to note that during this year's conference one of the committees is discussing violence and harassment against women and men in the world of work. The Maltese Government welcomes the ILO's action in this area and augurs that the discussions taking place will result in the approval of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. It is important to place the proposed Convention in a human rights context, and it would be ideal to recall the impact of violence and harassment at the workplace and the labour market. We also encourage implementation of definitions which reflect as much as possible the current realities of the world of work. The application of the absolute prohibition of violence and harassment should not be limited only to the traditional context but should be extended to cover other dynamics including coverage of third parties. The recognition of the right to a world of work free from violence and harassment, coupled with integrated national approaches, should form the basis of an eventual Convention. Prevention of violence and harassment through pre-established employer intervention, such as through policies, is of fundamental importance. One should also consider the ever present need for education and awareness amongst society at large, as this matter affects us all. There is a pertinent need to consider the input that the social partners may provide in the areas of prevention and education. No legal instrument can ever be effective if it is not complemented by a strong, efficient and effective monitoring and enforcement mechanism. The Maltese Government places the issue of violence against women and men at the top list of priorities when Malta had the presidency of the Council of the EU, which led to the EU's signature of the Istanbul Convention in June 2017. I truly hope that more countries sign and ratify the Istanbul Convention in order to ensure protection for women and girls in all spheres of life. Malta ratified the Istanbul Convention, and last April the Maltese Parliament approved the strengthening of the Gender-Based Violence and Domestic Violence Act. I thank you.

Employer (Russian Federation)

Chairman, ladies and gentlemen. Achieving the 2030 Development Agenda and its Sustainable Development Goals is extremely relevant both for the global community and for Russia. The goals of Agenda 2030 are fully in step with the goals of ensuring scientific and technological progress and social and economic development in Russia. These goals were set forth by Presidential decree by President Putin a month ago, and they are to be achieved by 2024. The main goal is to place the Russian Federation among the world's five largest economies by achieving faster economic growth rates than the global average and by increasing labour productivity and boosting employment. This should be done by increasing wages, raising the standard of living and life expectancy of our citizens, creating comfortable living conditions and opportunities for their self-fulfilment and for tapping the talent of each individual whilst respecting gender equality. Achieving all this will require serious structural changes, systemic measures to ensure a balance and sustainable form of economic and social development. According to Russian business, a number of tasks must be tackled in order to expand the scope of economic freedoms and to develop entrepreneurship. This includes ensuring fiscal stability, moving away from excessive and ineffective government control and supervision, developing modern infrastructure including digital infrastructure and raising the quality of the judiciary. These tasks cannot be achieved without increasing trust between the State and businesses, including by creating more predictable economic and social policies and principles for social partnerships. As the ILO Director-General's report rightly notes, the spread of new technologies is opening up new opportunities but also creating new challenges, especially on the labour market. This process will lead both to some jobs being created and to others disappearing. It will have an impact on business competitiveness, on labour relations and the forms of employment, and it will require the development of new professional skills and competencies. In Russia, a lack of skilled workers remains one of the main obstacles to dynamic economic development. That is why developing our human capital and modernizing vocational education, including by introducing flexible hands-on and adaptable educational programmes, remains one of the main tasks for businesses but also for the State in general in the near future. The concept we are discussing today, the Future of Work and achieving the Sustainable Development Agenda, will require effective international partnerships. The growing trend of circumventing the United Nations Security Council to adopt sanctions and the United State of America's unilateral actions in the field of trade could bring down the entire system of international economic relations. It undermines the efforts of international organizations to create enabling conditions for achieving the SDGs and for solving pressing social economic challenges. That said, the sanctions introduced against the Russian Federation have, in part, helped boost our economy. We are successfully carrying out a programme of import substitution, and we are anchoring the production of global companies in Russia. This has given an additional boost to the development of agriculture and to a whole range of industries. We believe that in the end, sooner or later, the futility of these sanctions will be recognized by all and will be relegated to the past. As we stand on the eve of the 100th anniversary of the ILO, which we will celebrate next year, I would like to say that we are certain that joint efforts of international social partners will be pivotal, not just in shaping the future world of work but also in creating a sustainable and predictable world order. Thank you for your attention.

Government (Tunisia)

Mr Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, at the outset, allow me to congratulate Mr Samir Murad, the Minister of Labour in Jordan, for his election as President of the 107th ILC. I would like as well to thank Mr Guy Ryder, Director-General of the ILO, for his efforts in strengthening the organization and enhancing its relation with member States with social partners as well as international organizations. I would like to say that I share the Director-General's assessment of the key milestones achieved by the organization in the past ten years towards achieving decent work, namely the enforcement of international labour standards regarding equality, lack of discrimination and social dialogue. I do think that achieving new milestones requires a closer linkage between all those standards on one hand, and the economic and social policies of countries on the other hand, so that the international labour standards do become a benchmark tool in order to establish and achieve social justice in all regions and all countries. The report has extensively discussed the role of women, especially as the report has noted the increasing number of women and female workers in vital sectors including education. Yet women are still faced with discrimination, lack of equality and job opportunities in promotions as well as in wages. The report also has noted that the high number of female workers in informal economy depriving them of their basic rights at work. Ladies and gentlemen, Tunisia is one of the pioneer countries that have achieved gender equality. This journey has started in Tunisia with the enactment of civil status bill, or law, in 1956 and an employment bill in 1966. These two laws have been the backbone of our journey towards achieving equality and eliminating all types of discrimination against women. This legal framework has been strengthened by the new constitution that stipulated that the country is bound to achieving equality, equal opportunity and to eliminating all types of discrimination against women. These laws and legislation have achieved a quantum leap in the situation of Tunisian women. The enrolment rates of girls in Tunisia has reached 99 per cent, whereas female university graduates' percentage has reached 60 per cent against 40 only for males. In August 2004, we have enacted a new law that will penalize sexual harassment and impose criminal sanctions against perpetrators. We have also adopted gender equality in all elected constitutional councils, which is one of the principles that have been brought up by the revolution of 2011, consecrated by the Constitution, and this shows a good awareness about the new position of women in democratic transition and in individual and collective freedoms. To further protect women against violence at work, we have also enacted a new law in August 2017, and the new legislation has included a number of arrangements to help the working women have some time free to take care of her children, and we have adopted some arrangements regarding pregnant women as well as nursing or breastfeeding women. The President of our Republic has taken an initiative in order to present a new draft bill to the People's Assembly so that we acknowledge the principle of equality and inheritance between male and female citizens. Ladies and gentlemen, in July 2017, and in the presence of the Director-General, Tunisia has signed the Decent Work Programme for Tunisia for the period 2017-2022. And the three partners, the Government as well as the Tunisian General Labour Union and the Confederation of Industry Trade and Handicraft in Tunisia have agreed on a number of measures including a new form of social dialogue, reforming social security, a new model of professional relations as well as the importance of professional training. Ladies and gentlemen, I seize this occasion to address my thanks to the organization for standing by the side of social workers and their partners in the occupied Arab territories. I would like to say that the reason behind the [vgr INAUDIBLE 5:31] in Palestine and other occupied territories lies in the continuous occupation and also the human blockade imposed on the people of Palestine. And the international committee is turning a blind eye to this. We have to stand by the side of the Palestinian people in their right to self-determination and establishing an independent state with Jerusalem as capital, and thank you.

Mr Huang

Employer (China)

Mr Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, let me first congratulate the Chairman and three Vice-Chairpersons on their election. I believe this conference will be a complete success under your leadership and with the support from the tripartite constituents. With this unique principle of tripartism ILO, cooperated closely with governments, trade unions and the employers' organizations of member States and played a critical role in promoting gender equality and social justice in the past 99 years since the establishment. The Director-General's report to the conference, The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality, calls for each member State to focus on protecting the rights of women at work including the formulation of relevant laws and policies, eradication of occupational discrimination and inequality at work, fair evaluation of work value of women, increasing women's representation in society and economy, realizing equal pay for equal work, ending violence and sexual harassment at work, empowering women, and enhancing joint efforts of tripartite constituents to realize decent work for women. We appreciate and support the report. Under the leadership of President Xi Jinping, China pays high attention to women's liberation, elimination of gender discrimination, promotion of gender equality and encouraging equal job opportunities for women. The Chinese Government promotes gender equality as the basic national policy and the foundations for social progress, allocation of labour force and the realization of modern prospering society. With the continuous social and economic development, the employment and environment for women in China has been improving with increasing women employments in various sectors. According to the China National Bureau of Statistics, women employees accounted for 43.1 per cent of the total in China in 2016. There have been significant changes for women employment, particularly those in private sector in China in recent years as a result of the transformation of government functions, deepening reform of the economic system and adjustment of industrial structures. It has become the top priority for both Government and social partners to promote gender equality, enterprises and guarantee the rise for equal employment. As the national employers' and the business organization, China Enterprise Confederation participates in the national tripartism together with the Government and the trade unions, participates in relevant activities of the ILO, adheres to ILO principles, encourages enterprises to assume their corporate social responsibilities and promote gender equality at work. In recent years, we cooperated with the ILO in promoting gender equality at work including conducting surveys on women employment in enterprises in China, publishing books like gender and women entrepreneurship, a guidebook of gender equality and enterprises and so on, and training for the enterprises to eliminating discrimination at work and awareness raising of ILO Convention 111. These activities helped Chinese enterprises to better understand international labour standards and the best practices, strengthened their awareness of gender equality, made use of relevant tools to contribute to better environments for women employment and promoted sustainable enterprise development and social progress.

Dear Delegates, under the leadership of President Xi Jinping, China is now implementing the strategic vision of building a moderately prosperous society in all aspects and realizing the Chinese dream of great rejuvenation of the Chinese nation. Enterprises and entrepreneurs are a major driving force for both social and economic development and realization of decent work and the harmonious society. We will continue to communicate and cooperate with the ILO and the employers' organizations of other countries for realization of gender equality and social justice for all. Thank you.

Employer (Malta)

Dear President, distinguished guests, in the report on social dialogue and tripartism presented for this year's conference, social dialogue is regarded as a means to achieve social equity, economic efficiency and democratic participation. Malta is a good example of how strong tripartite social dialogue structures have contributed to economic growth. The social partners were key players in the debate to join the European Union in 2004. Their role was essential in identifying and recommending policies to vindicate the negative impact of the international recession a few years later, and these policies were successful in keeping the country out of recession and minimizing unemployment. In 2012, a Jobs Plus agreement was signed by the social partners which focused on intensifying active labour market policies to increase labour participation rates. In 2017, a historic agreement was signed which guarantees that any employee will not remain for more than one year on the minimum wage if employed with the same employer. Malta also has an inclusive working environment with significant progress made over the years in the rate of employment of minorities. I am optimistic that the current heated debate on the equality bills in Malta will result in a positive outcome for all parties concerned. All these initiatives have yielded positive results. Since joining the EU average GDP per capita has increased from less than 75 per cent of the EU average to 95 per cent. Malta has one of the lowest unemployment rates in the EU. There has been a healthy increase in female participation rate driven both by positive incentives and economic necessities, and yet the increase in domestic labour supply could not keep up with the rate of job generation. The shortfall in labour supply in the private, which has partly been caused by an increase in employment in the public sector, is being matched by an influx of foreign labour both from inside and outside the EU to the extent that in the private sector today 30 per cent of employees are non-Maltese. This momentum of real GDP growth in excess of 5 per cent in 2017 has improved the state of the country's finances with a fall in public debt to 51 per cent of GDP from a high of 70 per cent in 2011. In spite of these positive indicators, the country still faces serious challenges, some of which are a consequence of its economic successes, others which are self-created. The Malta Employers' Association believes that an essential imperative is that the current level and types of activity should not come at the cost of placing at risk the country's economic sustainability. Malta is undergoing a period of rapid demographic change, mostly brought about through the influx of foreign workers, and given Malta's geographic limitations, this is resulting in an overheating of the property market which, in turn, is becoming a major cause of wage inflation which is not backed by productivity. Employers are calling for a long-term strategic approach to such a radical social and economic transformation to have a managed transition that will address the pressure that this expansion in population has on the social and physical infrastructure, our education and health services and natural environment.

Our main growth sectors, gaming and financial services, are inherently volatile and heavily dependent on our international reputation and rigorous corporate governance. Unfortunately, recent events involving financial institutions of repute are placing our reputation and economic future at risk. The brutal assassination of Daphne Caruana Galizia, Malta's foremost investigative journalist, has left an indelible mark on the country's social fabric. Our governance is also being undermined by having members of Parliament occupying executive positions in public entities, thus creating a serious conflict of interest between their legislative and executive roles. The changing nature of jobs is also an issue which calls for the involvement of the social partners. Malta still has a worrying incidence of early school-leavers which threatens to make us ill-prepared for the demands of an increasingly digitized economy in the coming years. In the EU, it is estimated that between 25 and 45 per cent of employees are either overqualified or underqualified for their jobs, which underscores the importance of education policies that calibrate as much as possible education and attainment with the needs of an ever-changing industrial environment. A precondition of successful tripartism is a bottom-up approach to socio-economic measures that involves all social partners at national, regional and global levels. It is regretful that during the ILO conference this year a bad example has been set as the officers openly expressed support for the Swedish Global Deal without seeking, let alone obtaining, the approval its constituents. Clearly, this goes contrary to good governance and is also contrary to one of the four strategic objectives of the ILO, that of social dialogue and tripartism. The Office should explain why and how such an instrument has been developed without the involvement of the employers. This top-down approach is uncharacteristic of the ILO, particularly coming on the eve of its 100th anniversary which is a landmark of numerous positive achievements that have, through social dialogue, shaped the world of work worldwide. Thank you.

Government (People's Democratic Republic of Lao)

Excellency, Mr Chairperson, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen. On behalf of the Government of the People's Democratic Republic of Lao, it's a great honour and pleasure for me to address this 107th International Labour Conference. This is a very significant event in the context of member States' implementation of the Sustainable Development Goals and their Country Programmes for Decent Work. Please allow me also to take this opportunity to congratulate you and the Vice-Chair upon being elected to lead our meeting. I would like to support this year's discussion on Women at Work. This is one of the key issues that will complement the ILO's centenary, and I would like to share with you a few points on the progress of our work in our country, the challenges that we have been addressing and the plans that we have been working on for our work in the People's Democratic Republic of Lao. So far, the Lao PDR has achieved some key progress in implementation of the 8th National Socio-Economic Plan. There has been increased national economic growth and workers have seen an increase in their success in protecting the rights and the benefits that they enjoy. This is because of the work of the Lao Government, through the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare working along with tripartite organizations and the sectors concerned, in adapting the legislation and regulations of the Lao PDR to translate the Conventions that we have ratified, such as the Convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women, into regulations in our country. Women workers as a result of this also are protected and are treated in equal terms with male workers at work. They have opportunities to access development of skills. They have equal payment and wages and rights to leave in periods of pregnancy and on childbirth. In addition, there have been projects included in our Decent Work Programme. Ladies and gentlemen, our Government places a great priority on labour inspection as a key instrument to follow up and monitor the implementation of the provisions of labour legislation relating to the protection of women and workers in general, in the workplace and in factories. It has conducted training exercises and raised awareness of labour law in the workplace and on entrepreneurship at a central and local level in order to help people understand and implement labour legislation. On this auspicious occasion I would like very much to thank the ILO for its valuable technical and financial support to the People's Democratic Republic of Lao. This assistance is a valuable and important contribution to our national socio-economic development and to our activity in labour and social welfare. I sincerely hope that the ILO will continue to provide this invaluable support to the People's Democratic Republic of Lao. To conclude, I wish the conference every success. Thank you very much.

Government (Republic of Korea)

Mr President, ministers of the member States, workers' and employers' representatives and distinguished delegates. Since its launch in May last year, the Moon Jae-in administration has pursued a society where labour is truly respected as a national agenda, bringing a lot of changes to labour policies in Korea. As the first female Minister of Employment and Labour of the Republic of Korea, I am pleased to introduce to you policy changes brought by the new Government under the theme of Women at Work. When I worked at a bank in the past, I witnessed gender discrimination prevalent in the workplace, and I decided to start a labour movement. As a labour activist, I took the lead in enacting the Equal Employment Opportunity Act and revising the law to include the equal pay for work of equal value principle. However, even today, 30 years after the establishment of the Act, women still have fewer opportunities to participate in the labour market, face discrimination in employment, promotion and pay, and are very vulnerable to violence and harassment at work as well as career interruptions, not just in Korea, but in many other countries around the world. Under the circumstances, I believe the Director-General's report on gender equality in the world of work and the agenda for discussion at the technical committee, ending violence and harassment in the world of work, are very meaningful and cannot have come at a more opportune time. In this sense, the Korean Government strongly supports the ILO's Women at Work initiative and has taken various measures in this regard. First, the Government is eliminating factors behind women's career interruptions by laying a foundation for work-family balance. As the Director-General's report underlines the growth of care economy as a way to support women's entry into the labour market, we need more workplace childcare centres where working parents can willingly leave their children with trust. Starting this year, the Government is establishing public workplace day care centres in residential areas and transportation hubs for low-income mothers and fathers at small and medium-sized enterprises. Next year the Government will further promote public workplace day care centres through a four times increase in the budget to about $55 million. Second, the government is taking strict measures to root out discrimination and violence against women. Recently, the #MeToo movement has been growing in Korea, raising public awareness about sexual harassment and violence and spreading efforts to put an end to them. Taking advantage of this movement, the Government has revised a law last year to take stronger action against gender discrimination in hiring and ensure that perpetrators of sexual harassment or sexual violence face heavy punishment while victims receive stronger protection from secondary victimization. Third, the Korean Government is striving to improve the way people work and their work culture. Koreans have worked the longest hours per year in the world. In February this year, the National Assembly of Korea passed a law to reduce the maximum weekly hours of work, paving the way for a better work-family balance. Furthermore, the Government plans to give more people the right to request reduced working hours. Currently, this right is limited to those who are pregnant or with childcare responsibilities. The target will be expanded to include those who need to take care of their family members or those who need medical treatment due to illness. The Government is also promoting flexible work arrangements to allow women to decide how many hours they work every day. Finally, the Korean Government is breaking the glass ceiling by increasing the number of women in senior positions, and it plans to gradually increase the share of female executives in public organizations to as high as 28 per cent by 2020. Of course, it is still not high enough but as the Korean Government has just taken the first step toward more women at work, I would like to ask for your continuous support. Mr President and distinguished delegates, gender equality in the world of work is a common task which requires cooperation among countries around the world and with international organizations. I hope that this year's conference will be a valuable opportunity for the ILO, as well as workers, employers and governments from around the world, to share experiences and develop important policy ideas for all. For Korea's part it will step up its efforts to achieve a society where labour is truly respected through continuous dialogue with workers and employers and will do its best to ratify the Conventions. Before I conclude, Korea, after a long history of enmity and confrontation is now at a watershed moment for a path towards peace and prosperity. Following the two inter-Korean summits, the first historic talks between the heads of North Korea and the US are just one week away. I would like to ask for your support to ensure that this summit will serve as an opportunity to shift Korea from the status of an armistice to a complete end of war and from conflict to peace. Thank you.

Mr Lindström

Government (Finland)

Dear Colleagues, ladies and gentlemen. I would like to thank Director-General, Guy Ryder, for the excellent report on gender equality. The Finnish Government stresses the importance of this topic. Among the Centenary Initiatives gender equality should have a high priority. ILO should step up its activities aimed at improving the disadvantaged situation of women in the global labour market. Gender equality is already covered by several ILO standards. Conventions on equal pay and on discrimination at work belong to the ILO core Conventions. Their obligations are included in many trade agreements and corporate social responsibility initiatives. Mainstreaming gender equality and non-discrimination in all ILO activities has to be further enforced. Good examples of gender mainstreaming are those Better Work projects which promote decent work in the female-dominated garment sector. Those projects promote, at the same time, all aspects of decent work, such as equal treatment and equal pay, health and safety, and their right to join trade unions and bargain collectively. Dear Chair, it is, however, not enough for the ILO to mainstream gender equality and non-discrimination in all its activities. Activities having as their principle aim gender equality and non-discrimination are necessary as well. The

---

Gallup-ILO shows that women and men in all regions have identified work-family balance and affordable care services as one of the biggest challenges women face in the world of work. An equal share of family responsibilities between mothers and fathers should be promoted. When fathers use their right to parental and paternity leave, mothers can go to work. It is also important to develop new care economy to promote the employment opportunities of men and women with family responsibilities, as prescribed in the Report of the Director-General. As the report says, the potential of the Conventions on workers with family responsibilities has not been fully exploited. This Convention has only been ratified by 44 member states, including Finland. The ILO should therefore initiate a campaign to promote its ratification. A new general survey assessing the work-life balance and the relevant legislation in member states and identifying the obstacles to ratify the Convention could be a good way of paying attention to the urgency of the matter and finding a solution. There is still a lot to do in all regions and member States in tackling the gender pay gap. The recent ILO Global Wage Report illustrated that collective bargaining is an important tool when promoting equal pay for work of equal value. We also support the Equal Pay International Coalition. Both women and men need protection against violence and harassment at work. The new standard, which is under preparation in the current and the next labour conference, improves in particular women's situation in the labour market, since women are more often victims of violence and harassment. Finland supports this standard setting work, but I would also like to stress the need to avoid unnecessary details which may generate obstacles for member States to fulfil or ratify the standard. The new instrument may gain special attention in the media and among the citizens because of its topicality and as the instrument will be adapted by the ILO centenary conference. We hope that the centenary instrument will also have a high priority in the future work of the ILO. One of the Finnish challenges relating to gender equality in the labour market is the relatively low employment rate of the recently arrived female refugees and asylum seekers. We try to tackle this problem inter alia by language training and vocational training. As we lack skilled labour in many sectors, it is also in the interest of the employers to find employment immediately or through work-related training for these workers. I hope that our social partners could also help these persons integrate in the labour market and into society. Thank you, Chair.

Worker (Tunisia)

Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, allow me at the outset to congratulate you on your election, and I would like to thank Guy Ryder for his important reports with special emphasis on the discussion of this general debate on the role of women and the new push for equality. As part of our contribution to enrich the discussion and to contribute to the centenary instrument, we would like to present to you the most important outcomes of a field study that was conducted by the youth section of the Tunisian Workers' Confederation. Tunisia is one of the leading countries in giving special importance to the situation on women in society. This was reflected through legislation and the implementation of such legislation. The legislation in 2011, under societal pressure, introduced several pieces of legislation to increase or to embody the equality between both sexes and to combat human trafficking and to deal with violence against women. The field study I made reference to deals with violence and discrimination, not only in the workplace but also in education and their role in society. Discrimination between sexes is clear to be seen in the work and the labour market. Women only fill 41 per cent of jobs available, especially women with university degrees. We also have a problem of girls dropping out of school. This leads to social dangers where they become susceptible to illegal employment or exploitation and this, as a result, leads to discrimination, violence, and early marriage. And early pregnancy leads to women's exclusion, and women are made redundant as a result of their pregnancy, they do not enjoy promotion and cannot assume high-ranking positions. It is true that women in Tunisia have acquired important achievements. However, violence and discrimination continue to leave its shadow on the situation of women, especially in social life. It is worth noting here that radicalism, extremism also have a negative impact on the achievements women have been able to realize. Whereby women is always affiliated to men, there is a refusal of equality and there is an attempt to try and use women as a tool in extremist approaches. Ladies and gentlemen, allow me to use this opportunity to make some recommendations in order to contribute to the role of women. First of all, we need to adopt a model code of conduct where women are protected against violence. Also, we need to take strict measures in dealing with exploitation of domestic workers and also we need to deal with human trafficking and the role of employment agencies. And, in the fourth place, we need to have proper inspection measures and to raise the level of awareness whereby women are made aware of the need to report acts of violence and the use of minors. Fifth, we need to have a trade union campaign to improve awareness of decent work and social protection. There is a need for an observatory to encourage work on equality, and we also need to provide crèches to provide leave for pregnant women and nursing women. We also need to introduce into curricular the level of awareness that deals with violence and harassment. Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, we are facing a difficult economic and social situation in Tunisia, and in the light of the political instability, we have to allow trade unions to play a significant role through active participation to deal with a national dialogue that will allow all parties to assume their responsibility. In conclusion, I can only support the views of the Director-General on the situation in occupied Palestine. We strongly condemn the massacres committed by the Zionist entity which led to the deaths of scores of people and hundreds of injured. We laud the struggle of the Palestinian people and the rights to a state and its capital in East Jerusalem. [vgr INTERRUPTION 7:04]

Employer (Turkey)

Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, I greet you on behalf of Turkish Confederation of Employer Associations and wish you a successful session and a constructive conference. Mr President, TISK has been a credible partner of the ILO during the last 60 years. We have mutual trust and a high level of understanding in labour and social issues. Next year will be the centennial of this unique organization. As the first specialized agency of the UN, ILO's expertise and knowledge accumulated over the 100 years must be renowned and celebrated. We believe that we have to give priority to formulate a new roadmap for the new future of the ILO. At this point, it is recommended that the ILO should broaden its mandate to address all social and economic challenges which are faced today by its tripartite constituents. Within the framework of Centenary Initiatives, which were introduced by the Director-General in 2016, the Future of Work initiative enabled the broadest discussion on possible scenarios of our labour markets, especially the debate on the Global Commission on the Future of Work will serve as a basis for the conference committee in 2019. Turkey has shown an outstanding economic performance in the last two decades, and numerous measures are being taken by the Government and private sector. However, Turkish enterprises have been facing some challenges such as human capital deficits and skill mismatches. The National Employment Strategy was introduced in 2014, covering several economic and social measures, and it was a milestone for the Turkish labour market. Following this, a series of incentives were introduced in 2017 and also in 2018. These incentives have greatly contributed to the increase of employment, and they affected the labour piece positively. As indicated by the Director-General's thematic report, the effective participation of women in our labour market is a precondition for the overall success of our economies. The gender sensitive policies to tackle women's underrepresentation in workplaces must be developed by relevant stakeholders. As the main factor into our national policy-making process, in respect to social issues, the ILO has an exclusive role to play in this field. Concerning the women's labour market participation, the Turkish private sector and Labour Ministry has been working to increase women employment, and these are promising endeavours in the women's labour force participation, whose effects are to be observed in the near future. Mr President, this year the conference agenda ahead of us responds to various issues in our social and economic environments. The discussions among tripartite constituents on violence and harassment at work, international development cooperation and social dialogue will provide us with concrete policy options on these important topics. The elimination of violence and harassment at work is crucial for employers. However, there are various complexities on the definition of harassment and violence. In our view, with regard to the possible protective measures against these behaviours, legal uncertainty must be prevented and diverse realities of member countries should be taken into consideration. Regarding the international development cooperation, we would like to underline that employers' needs and concerns must be taken into consideration with this cooperation. Mr President, with regard to the application committee, Turkey has shown a high level of compliance to the international labour standards. Turkey has ratified all eight fundamental Conventions, and recently ratified the Conventions on health and safety at work with regard to mines and construction sites. I want to conclude by reminding the participants that last year Turkey hosted the 10th European Regional Conference of the ILO, and we had the privilege of having important consultations with prominent social partners around the region. The Istanbul Initiative was adopted as a result of this important meeting, and it will serve as a roadmap to our tripartite commitment to address regional problems. Once again, we would like to thank the Turkish Government and the ILO to have organized this conference in Turkey. Thank you for your attention.

Worker (Republic of Korea)

Mr Chairman, distinguished delegates, before I got on the flight to Geneva, I had been involved in a sit-in in front of the House of the President in Seoul along with KCTU members. The protest was staged against a regressive revision of the Minimum Wage Act, which had been passed on May 28, by the ruling party of the Government that respects labour along with the Conservative opposition, and today the cabinet council decided finally to promulgate the revised legislation. President Moon had pledged to increase the minimum wage to 10,000 Korean Won (KRW) by 2020, and on the basis of that, the minimum wage for 2018 was set to 7,530 KRW. Then the pro-business media started attacking the increase and employers started adopting various measures to avoid paying this increased amount. In the end, the ruling party took a lead in drafting and passing a revision to the law to nullify the increase in the minimum wage. Moreover, it is possible for employers unilaterally to change the rules on working conditions to the disadvantage of the workers. If the Government wants to reduce income equality in the country, then it should hold business conglomerates responsible and not take back what has been given to low-wage workers. The KCTU is organizing a 100,000 worker-strong national rally on June 30, and bringing all of our strength together, we will defeat this minimum wage reduction act. Chair, delegates, the KCTU's process is deeply related to the question of Women at Work, the subject of our discussion today. So far in Korea, it has been women who have been leading the campaign for a higher minimum wage. When the statutory minimum wage is set, this directly leads to a pay rise for almost all women workers who are paid the level of the minimum wage. Korea's gender pay gap is currently the largest among OECD countries, and this is an expression and a result of all of the different kinds of discrimination that women face up to. Women are usually paid less than men when they start their first job. Women are concentrated in low-paid and precarious jobs. This is due to deep-rooted segregation of different occupations by gender, and women's jobs are generally undervalued. Women are considered to be responsible for childcare, and this exposes women to discrimination in promotion and leads to breaks in their careers. Sexual violence and harassment by male managers who have power over them are a threat to a safe working environment. Korea desperately needs the new push for gender equality suggested by the Director-General. The #MeToo campaign has revealed numerous cases of violence and harassment faced by women workers in the world of work and a collective determination to change has come about. It has been found that trade unions are the most effective tools to prevent and resolve these widespread problems. With the power of the union, women can be stronger and can bring equality to their workplace. To support and strengthen the movement, the new standard on violence and harassment at work should be a Convention accompanied by a Recommendation. As one of the Centenary Initiatives, the campaign for the universal ratification of the fundamental Conventions has been geared up. The Conventions are vital for those who are fighting for a society where everyone can enjoy their fundamental rights. The Korean Teachers and Educational Workers Union, which was deprived of its legal status by the corrupt Government, is still struggling for its recertification, even now under the new Government. Workers in Samsung are in the forefront of the fight against transnational corporations' global non-union management policy and aggressive union busting. Workers in non-standard forms of employment are campaigning for their fundamental rights. Ms Lee Young-joo, the former General-Secretary of the KCTU, is still in jail for exercising the right to strike and the right to peaceful assembly and to association. It's time for the Korean Government finally to ratify ILO Conventions 87 and 98, which have been delayed for 26 years, to guarantee freedom of association for all workers including teachers and public officials. They should not delay ratification. The Moon Government should immediately begin the process of ratification. Thank you very much for your attention.

Government (Jordan)

Excellencies, President, Director-General of the ILO, ladies and gentlemen, the Director-General, during the inauguration, presented his report on The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality and the work which is underway to try and reduce the gap which exists between men and women. It's important that we strengthen women's participation in the world of work, but we need to do more to overcome the obstacles which women are confronted with. The Director-General's report could be seen as a roadmap for all of us in order to strengthen women's participation and also to overcome the violence and harassment which they are confronted with. President, in Jordan, we have issues relating to the world of work, but we need to do more in our country. We need to introduce programmes to get women into work and to combat the situation as it is at the present time. The Government of Jordan has introduced an executive programme to increase women's participation in the labour market because we believe that having women working is an important aspect in combatting poverty, and we are trying to do more in this area. We are also re-examining our labour code, which was introduced in 2010, and we are looking to introduce important elements which will aim to increase women's participation in the labour force. At our summit on work, we will have a debate on decent work in order to guarantee security in those countries which are emerging from conflict. We have already expressed our opinion on this issue. We have said that international cooperation is vital for reassigning responsibility, and we all need to show solidarity. President, the crisis in Syria has now reached its eighth year. Jordan has done absolutely everything it can to receive refugees, and we have been confronted with significant obstacles in organizing our labour market given the number of Syrian refugees that we have had to receive and who are looking to work, or who are working, in the informal sector of our economy. Jordan has been able to do a great deal despite the difficulties we have been confronted with. We have launched a national plan to overcome the consequences of this crisis and in order to provide decent life opportunities for everyone, the opportunities to work, the economic opportunities for all Jordanians as well as Syrian refugees. Jordan's development partners, who we would like to thank for the efforts which they have undertaken. It is vital that the international community continues to support Jordan and to follow up those efforts which have already been undertaken by Jordan to provide services to refugees and society as a whole. Jordan has examined the Director-General's report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, and we are disappointed by what has been noted on the barriers which Israel has imposed on Palestinians wanting to enter into the labour market. These are obstacles to development, obstacles to Palestinians accessing the labour market, and we must overcome these obstacles which are the result of occupation, and we need to break down these barriers. In conclusion, I would like to thank Guy Ryder for the efforts which he has undertaken, and I would like to also thank all those working for the ILO and the regional office in our region for the work they have done to support Jordan, and we hope that they will continue to do so. We would like to also thank all the governments in our region and the governments and the workers for the confidence which they have shown Jordan in electing us to the presidency of this conference. Thank you.

Employer (Algeria)

Madam Vice-President, the Director-General of the ILO, members of the ILO, Excellencies, Ministers, Presidents of trade unions, Excellencies, the Presidents of the federations of employers, ladies and gentlemen, first of all it's a pleasure for me to congratulate the President of the Conference upon his election to the presidency of the 107th International Labour Conference. This reflects the confidence that you have placed in him. Ladies and gentlemen, could we once again express our serious commitment to collaborating at all levels. I would like to express my great esteem for this new struggle undertaken by the ILO Director-General, Mr Guy Ryder. We're very much aware of the efforts he has deployed with a view to providing momentum in the Euro-Mediterranean region and especially in Africa with a view to creating new employment opportunities for women, support young people and enable them to integrate into society whilst limiting child labour and exploitation. Ladies and gentlemen, the pioneering role of women in work is an important source, which has not fully been taken up, to enable economic growth around the world, and that is despite the fall in participation of women in the home in recent decades. But there is major growth in developing countries of 42 per cent of women working in 2018. You can compare that to 20 per cent work by men, but we do not have indicators showing any improvements between now and 2021. Now there are pioneering women in business, the number though is rather small compared with men. There are still obstacles encountered by women to gain access to management posts, high-level management, compared with the opportunities available to men. In that respect, Madam Chairman, we must actively work through the intensive programmes which encourage all States and all organizations to develop methods which will enable integration of women in business and creativity. Ladies and gentlemen, with respect to young people, our approach to this major category of society consists of fighting to guarantee social, political and security stability and achieving economic prosperity and well-being. I would like to call your attention to previous experiences of projects to support young people around the world that have succeeded. We adopt an optimistic strategy based on building awareness and culture amongst young people, also individual capacity building, and also we want to provide training services limiting bureaucracy so that young people can actually gain access to information technologies, and financing can be provided to put into practice ideas that young people have. We are seeing an increase in the phenomenon of child labour, ladies and gentlemen. This is due to economic factors, because there is a material need to work, the figure is 67.7 per cent, and there are other social factors, 10.8 per cent of children working because they're not going to school. Now, from a humane and a social point of view, this is quite dangerous for the future stability of our societies and our economies because we'll have generations who are not educated, and it will be easy to mobilize them to destroy the ethical and moral fabric of our society. So we would invite you to take all necessary measures to raise awareness and to visit the various countries so that those who commit crimes against young people will be prosecuted. I'd like to conclude by mentioning the suffering of the Palestinian people because of lack of stability and security in the region. They have been deprived of the possibility of building a better future. We must give them the right to education and decent work whilst allowing them to live dignified lives in a context of security throughout the Palestinian state. In conclusion, congratulations once again Mr

President, and on behalf of Algeria, I hope that your entire team will be greatly successful as you complete your tasks. We wish everyone peace, stability on the basis of positive partnership. Thank you very much.

Mr Yalçın

Workers (Turkey)

Distinguished President, distinguished delegates, first of all I would like to thank the President of the Conference, his deputies and ILO administration and his team who realized this very important session of the conference without any inconvenience. I hope that the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference provides us a better and fairer rules map. We are currently living in a world where tension is constantly on the rise, and it necessitates more effort and effective action to protect humanity, dignity, labour and to provide and sustain peace all over the world. The occupation of the Masjid al-Aqsa and the malignant decision to recognize Jerusalem as the capital of Israel should be on the agenda in Geneva as much as it is in Istanbul. The world has a problem of terrorism and terrorist organizations. Unfortunately, a collaborative action could not be reached in order to put an end to terrorism. Turkey has been putting up a fight against FETO terrorist organization, YPG, PKK, PYD and ISIS. However, Turkey is left alone in the struggle against terrorism. Wherever terrorism takes place, the target of those terrorist attacks is humanity and the victim is the entire world. With only this attitude, we can effectively combat and defeat terrorism. We have to realize the brutal competition and the destruction conducting to get a great share of the African gold and the Middle East oil. We firmly support the fact that the world is bigger than five and labour is greater than the capital. We attach great importance to the UN and ILO Sustainable Development Goals and fair distribution of income is, I think, the ultimate goal here. We have to clear our world and minds from the tricked economic definition based on a theory of scarce resources and unlimited needs. Mahatma Gandhi says, "There is enough in this planet for everyone's needs but not everyone's greed." I think this is a very meaningful statement. Esteemed delegates, if we cannot put tripartite organizations and trade union rights into the centre of those discussions, how can we have the power to win a victory over global exploitation? We, as MEMUR-SEN, The Confederation of Public Servants Trade Unions, are struggling to increase the rights of the public servants with our organised powers. Rates of public servants organizing trade unions have reached up to 70 per cent in Turkey. Turkey has a rising rate of 15 per cent in terms of workers trade unionism. Despite some limitations on the rights to organize, the rates have increased. Their representation is better now. We ask for the right to organize of retired people to be guaranteed by legal arrangements. The ban on strike and politics for public servants in Turkey needs to be abolished. Significant progress has been achieved in terms of right to collective labour agreements. However, there are still restrictive provisions and interpretations related to the scope of the collective labour agreements. We have public servants arbitration board, and we need structural and functional changes in this arbitration board. Unregistered employment in the formal economy, youth unemployment, labour force participation, female labour force participation and employment are still among the most important problems in Turkey. We invite all humanity, especially Europe, to take responsibility for the issue of refugees and integrating them to our labour force and to make effective contributions. In terms of occupational health and safety, the public sector needs to set an example. After the heinous military coup attempt on July 15, the state of emergency was announced in Turkey. Although this does not affect our daily lives, we think that the necessary conditions are now there to end the state of emergency. There are public sector staff that have been removed or dismissed from office as a result of this failed coup attempt and the State of Emergency Procedures Investigation Commission has been formed, and those that are found to be innocent will be reinstated to their jobs, and there are certain criticisms with regards to the pace of this investigation commission. We believe that the world is bigger than five. We believe that the labour ... [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:24] ... We think the labour is above the capital. I greet you all with respect on behalf of Turkey's labour sector, represented here. Thank you very much.

Mr Swe

Government (Myanmar)

Madam President, the single delegates, ladies and gentlemen, it is a great honour and pleasure for me to address this august assembly. The International Labour Organization, ILO, has been exerting relentless efforts for almost a century to ensure workers all over the world enjoy their rights fully in accordance with the objectives set up since its establishment. During this time span, it has been able to lead on effective labour standards in compliance with global socio-economic conditions. I am also very pleased to observe the significant progress in promotion and protection of the rights of the workers. Madam President, since decent work and gender equality at work are fundamental platforms for advancing social justice as envisaged in SDG Goals 5 and 8, the ILO Director-General's comprehensive reports to the conference entitled The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality is not only timely for the current situations but also highlights the future works to be undertaken. Thus, this constitutes an urgent call to place necessary emphasis on gender equality. I am glad to know that consultation on gender equality is initiated with a view to standardizing it globally. Many member States, including Myanmar, are still facing challenges, particularly in putting labour standards relating to gender equality at workplace into good practice and its full realization. As political traditions, economic and social backgrounds among the States are different, the time to achieve their respective goals in the areas of promoting labour rights, including gender equality, would vary. However, I am confident that with our political will, we will be able to accelerate our actions for gender equality. Madam President, Myanmar has been promoting gender equality norms in letter and spirit as prescribed in her Constitution. The laws enacted in the past have less provision reflecting gender equality. However, the new laws drafted in these days will be covering gender mainstreaming. Likewise, gender aspects will be included in revising the existing law to bring them in line with the global trends. In addition, Myanmar strongly rejects any forms of sexual violence and harassment and discrimination at the workplace. Myanmar has ratified the Convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women, CEDAW, and we have been implementing the provisions of the Convention by adopting necessary domestic policies. The National Strategic Plan for the Advancement of Women 2013-2022 and Thematic report on Gender Dimensions are the examples of promoting gender equality in Myanmar. At the same time, more efforts are being made. The law on protection and prevention against violation of women is now being drafted. Madam President, the labour law reform is an ongoing process in Myanmar with the assistance of social partners and development partners, including ILO. We were able to hold a total of ten rounds of national tripartite dialogue forums. The recent forums had led to endorsement to Myanmar Decent Country Work Programme 2018-2021 and 5-point Roadmap for better labour sector development. I sincerely hope Myanmar would be able to sign the Decent Work Country Programme with the ILO in the near future. Madam President, naturally, challenges continue to remain in promoting and protecting of labour rights for Myanmar. However, they are not insurmountable. The Government of Myanmar, working on the newly developed culture of tripartite dialogue, will certainly be able to reach desired goals in future with the technical assistance and support of ILO and the international of partners. Thank you for your kind attention.

Mr Majoul

Employer (Tunisia)

President of the Conference, ladies and gentlemen, I am delighted to be here to address you. I would like to congratulate you, President, on your election to the lead of this conference and wish you the very best of success in your work. It is also a pleasure for me to express my gratitude and congratulations to Guy Ryder on his report. We commend the way in which he has approached the issue and the in-depth substance. We would like to also congratulate the ILO staff and the Regional Bureau and thank them for their support which they have shown to Tunisia through various projects, working with the different social partners to help our democratic transition and to provide us with all the conditions for economic development and for providing jobs and social justice. The work undertaken by the ILO on the ground has been effective and has made it possible for us to put in place a social contract and a Decent Work Programme. They have also helped us to improve our pension system and to provide us with an employment strategy for the country. The success of any programme requires all stakeholders to be involved and needs to provide the opportunity for a free exchange of views and everyone needs to be represented. In Tunisia, we have held dialogue at institutional level, and we have also paid a great deal of attention to our legislative reform. We have supported social dialogue through the introduction of a National Tripartite Council and work is underway within that council. We have also undertaken work to re-examine our Constitution, looking at sustainable development. We have put in place the necessary framework, with the help of the ILO, and we have also drafted and signed a Memorandum of Understanding with all stakeholders involved. Ladies and gentlemen, our conference is looking at effective development cooperation to 2030, and this needs to be based on active participation in order to attain the 17 SDGs. We are also working to promote civil society. We believe that the development of the private sector is extremely important in order for us to achieve the goals which have been established: the goals of eradicating poverty, of guaranteeing personal development and guaranteeing decent work for all. The private sector has the qualities required to succeed. We are creative. We are effective, and we have a vital role to play in various areas: health, education and energy. We are the motor of development in our country. We propose that the ILO needs to pay attention to how cooperation between the private and the public sector can be promoted, particularly in vital sectors such as infrastructure, and it is also vital that investment policy is examined and entrepreneurship. All these are vital in order to guarantee decent work for all. The Director-General's successive reports have examined the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. We have seen the situation in the West Bank and the difficult situation which the Palestinian people are living in at the present time. We call upon everyone to respect international law and the Palestinians' right to self-determination, to have their own state with its own capital. We call upon the organization to pay more attention to peace and freedom as vital elements of its programme of work. Thank you very much.

Mr Ngige

Government (Nigeria)

Madam Chairperson, Director-General, distinguished ladies and gentlemen, I bring you all warm greetings from the Government and people of the Federal Republic of Nigeria. Nigeria appreciates the work carried out by this organization between 2016 and 2017, especially the implementation of the strategic objectives of the ILO, which are at the heart of the Decent Work Agenda. We also commend the Director-General for the choice of the topic for this conference, The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality, which reflects some of the major areas of concern and aspiration towards promotion of decent work. Chairperson, the provision of youth and women employment and the enhancement of the status of women at work continues to be a big challenge in our society. This has been exacerbated by the economic recession brought about by the fall in oil prices, militancy in some parts of the country, especially the North East, and the issue of returning migrants, the majority of whom are women and young girls trafficked for slavery and sex work, poses a problem. For a country in which females constitutes 49.4 per cent of total population of over the 200 million population, it is therefore imperative that issues which hinder increased and effective women participation in the labour force should be addressed. To address the issue of gender inequality and youth unemployment, the Government drew up and has been implementing the Economic Recovery and Growth Plan. The Government has also initiated a School-to-Work programme called N-Power, designed to empower young men and women with skills to facilitate their entry into the labour market. In terms of specific measures that address inequality, our Government recorded some successes in the following areas. The principle of equal pay for equal work for all without discrimination on account of sex is enshrined in the constitution of Federal Republic of Nigeria. A Presidential Initiative on the North East, PINE, is in place to promote girl-child education and special packages for women in the region for their economic empowerment. Employers of labour in the both the public and private sectors are by regulation requested to provided workplace crèches for nursing mothers for ease at workplace. In the public service, the Government recently increased the period of maternity leave from 12 to 16 weeks to allow enough recuperation time for both baby and mother, especially in the area of breastfeeding. In addition, all disciplinary proceedings against any female staff which might have been taken during the period of maternity leave shall be put in abeyance until the expiration of the leave. Employers of labour are also barred from removal of women from work due to their marital or maternity status. Other areas of achievement include, but not limited to, provision of Micro-credit soft loans to market women and female artisans and women entrepreneurs through our Government Enterprise Empowerment Programme. There is also offer of free medical services to pregnant women and children under five years in many federating states of the country. The ratification, domestication and implementation of the Maternity Protection Convention 186 and a conscious effort to ensure that more women enjoy maternity protection in the country is already in place. We have also the introduction of Home Grown School feeding programmes at national and sub-national levels to address the issue of male school dropout and female dropout. This has eased the burden of feeding on many mothers, especially those at work, and has created greater additional jobs as cooks and caterers for our women. However, Mr Chairperson, a lot needs still to be done. The most effective method of eliminating the gender gap from the workplace lies in vigorous opposition to employers' discriminatory conducts and policies and harassment in all forms wherever and whenever they occur. It is for women who are victim to these abuses to take legal actions and report to labour inspectors. The infusion into labour inspection laws and code of practice with severe sanctions and serious punitive measures are prescribed as future deterrents. In this respect, we will need the technical assistance of the ILO in the area of gender audits considering the good news that the ILO has a pool of over 80 certified audit facilitators. Finally, in conclusion, we expect that this transformation will start so that the women will be supported to attain their full potential alongside the men especially in the world of work. Thank you.

Mr Rabiei

Government (Islamic Republic of Iran)

In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful, Madam Chair, honourable Ministers, distinguished representatives of the workers and employers. At the outset I would like to extend my congratulations on the occasion of the holy months of Ramadan, the months of blessing, to all the Muslim sisters and brothers in the delegates and to all fasting workers. On the Women at the Work initiative, and in view of the rapid social and economic developments, our world requires further thinking and work so as to provide a better and brighter future for women. This initiative needs to be addressed in conjunction with the Future of Work initiative. In order to enhance the world of work, we all need to work together to promote peace, inclusion, social justice and decent work. Unfortunately, we are living in a world where some countries do not respect international agreements and drag parts of the world into violence and bombard innocent children and women for the purpose of their own economic and political interest. I regret to state that some powers in the world generate crisis and produce violence which mostly affects children and women. Our social dialogue, which is also on the agenda of the ILC, a one-size-fits-all approach should be avoided as the countries have their own specificities. We believe that social dialogue at international or national levels within the social groups and even the families requires a decent life. My country, with more than 100 years of experience in tripartism is following the labour matters. During the current administration, we have increased the number of workers' and employers' organizations by 50 per cent. Ending violence and harassment in the world of work is also of significant importance. Development of morality at the workplace is a must, but still unequal conditions, wide spread poverty and circumstances arising from political economy of international relations in the area of work lead to reproduction of violence. Violence in the world of work cannot be eliminated without addressing inequality and poverty at national and international levels and merely through ethical advice. Creating job security, ending violence against children and women or at workplaces is our national will. On the other agenda item of the conference, we believe in and support effective development cooperation. Madam Chair, I have the honour to state that women in my country have a higher standing, both in the families and in the society. Today, women and girls account for about 60 per cent of the entrance to the universities of the country. They are actively contributing to the advancement of the economy through either their invaluable work at home or in the public and private sectors of the country. At present, women constitute about 41 per cent of the governmental employees, so a 10 per cent increase in this respect was achieved. Moreover, the target has been set to accomplish allocation of at least 30 per cent of the top managerial posts to the qualified women of the country by the end of the current administration. Of 800,000 jobs generated last year, 60 per cent devoted to women. My Ministry strives to further empower women, particularly women head of families, to enter the labour market through, among other things, providing them with the free of charge skills and training and providing access to equal opportunities. Both men and women may wish to enjoy flexibility associated with some types of work so as to juggle work and family. I am of the view that ground should be prepared in order for them to take up such jobs in a manner that the pertaining conditions are in compliance with the labour standards. In this respect, the ILO should further improve the notion of reconciling work and family. Distinguished delegates, the Islamic Republic of Iran has always been dedicated to and is steadfast in its national and international commitments and has spared no efforts to fulfil them. Whereas we have gathered here in this august conference to discuss how the world of work could be improved around the globe which, of course, necessitates a collective responsibility for all the constituents, unfortunately some unfair and cruel sanctions are imposed on the economy of countries, including my country, with no justification. Sanctions that, by nature, targeted at hurting the livelihood of ordinary and vulnerable people and the workers. I deem it necessary to express the concerns of my Government regarding the sufferings and the killing of children, women and workers in the occupied Palestine. The global community and the international organizations, including the ILO, which first was the objective of justice, need to be more sensitive in this respect. Thank you for your attention.

Mr Haque

Government (Bangladesh)

Madam Chair, I congratulate you in your election to the Chair of the 107th International Labour Conference. I also wish to place on record our appreciation to the Director-General for his comprehensive report on The Women at Work Initiative: The Push for Equality. I commend the efforts made by the chairperson of the Governing Body for placing before us a detailed report on the last three sessions of the Governing Body. Madam Chair, we have made substantial progress towards achieving gender parity in the world of work over the past decades. Despite this, closing gender gap remains one of the most pressing labour market and social challenges. ILO's Women at Work Centenary Initiative is the right move towards the direction. The 2030 Agenda also gives added impetus to bring positive changes in the lives of women. We need to seize this opportunity to address it as a top priority. The Bangladesh family believes that development targets cannot be achieved if we leave our women behind who account for half of the population. One of the major steps taken by our Government was to pursue the National Women Development Policy guaranteeing equal opportunities and entitlements for women. We are creating a conducive work environment for women by ensuring their safety and security, providing them with accommodation facilities and introducing day care centres in and around their workplace. As a result, our female workforce has risen from 24 per cent to around 40 per cent over the last four years. Madam Chair, Bangladesh is the second largest exporter of ready-made garments in the world, and women represent 70 per cent of the workforce in that crucial sector. In an unprecedented way, and with the agreement of the factory owners, our Government has been able to raise their wage by 77 per cent, women being the beneficiaries mostly. We have taken measures to facilitate women entrepreneurs of small business to market their commodities. We have set up Joyita, an organization of the young women entrepreneurs to encourage them in small in medium sized business and creating jobs for some other women. Women in Bangladesh are also actively participating in government and politics. Uniquely in Bangladesh, the Prime Minister, Speaker of Parliament, Leader of the Opposition and Deputy Leader of the House all are women. The World Economic Forums Global Gender Gap Report puts Bangladesh among the first seven countries for reducing gender gaps in politics, whereas we overall rank 47th among 144 nations of the world in minimizing gender gap. Women are a significant source of untapped talent in the global workforce. Providing them education and increasing their digital fluency can help them move into productive jobs. Our Government has made education free for girls up to 12th grade and is giving them stipends. We have achieved almost 100 per cent enrolment at primary level with gender parity. We are providing women with greater access to information and technology, along with skill development training as we aspire to build an inclusive, knowledge-driven Digital Bangladesh by 2021. Despite significant advancement, we have more to do stopping incidents of violence against women. We are making all out efforts in ending all forms of discrimination and violence against women, including in the workplaces. We further look for the outcome of the standard setting discussion of the ongoing conference on violence and harassment against women and men in the work. Madam Chair, as I speak, continued aggression and oppression in the occupied Palestinian territory is demolishing the livelihood of Palestinians and limiting their access to economic opportunities and decent work. We are encouraged that the DG of ILO has visited the territory recently. Madam Chair, we need a strong political will to ensure gender equality in all walks of our life and livelihood. Let us once again take a vow to achieve gender parity in all aspects, including at the world of work and make the globe a better placed for women. I thank you.

Ms Khine Khine

Employer (Myanmar)

Greetings from Myanmar Federation of Chamber of Commerce and Industry. The employers of Myanmar wish to achieve a robust and stable industrial peace in the country with improved labour market governance. We applauded the GB's decision at the 332nd Session on reporting of forced labour cases no longer be required for Myanmar. It is a valid proof of well-coordinated and cooperative inclusive work of all concerned institutions and constituents. We thank the ILO for the tireless and endless effort and support provided. Since May 2015, Myanmar employers actively participate in National Tripartite Dialogue Forum, which in its fourth years of progressive tripartite engagement of constituents, covering Decent Work Country Programme, labour law reform, communication strategy and child labour eradication. The DWCP 2018-2021 has successfully been drafted, agreed upon by tripartite bodies this year, January, during the 9th NTDF. I am proud to say that it is going to be signed in the very near future. It is very important for Myanmar employers to prioritize the reform of labour organization law 2011, which limits the establishment as well as rights of employers' organizations. Settlement of labour dispute law is equally important as a priority law for reform because of the shortcomings in the current dispute resolution system, both in law and practice. As much as we, the tripartite constituents, value the culture of tripartite dialogue, the employers would like to call on all stakeholders to acknowledge the outcomes from the process. We fully support GB's stand on labour law reform process through effective tripartite dialogue to promote freedom of association and in line with international legal standards. It is equally important that the implementation of a law should be improved and appropriate enforcement of a law occurs in practice. We know that the ILO has shared advice with tripartite partners in Myanmar that prison sentences are not conducive to good industrial relations and should not be included in the law for minor or administrative labour law violations. It is very discouraging for the private sector to see other social partners fail to heed this advice. This will damage industrial relations in the long run and be a barrier in building trust among tripartite constituents. We also note that the implementation of industrial action on the ground is sometimes inconsistent with the law and international standards. Often, unions on strike will blockade businesses and not allow management or other workers to enter or leave the business. This has led to numerous violent confrontations. Enforcement of relevant laws has been insufficient, and in the long run is detrimental to building peaceful industrial relations. Myanmar Foreign Investment Law has drawn attention from the international businesses to invest in Myanmar. It is crucial that all of the other laws are clear and easily understandable by all nationals. In general, some laws are outdated and irrelevant to the modern private sector. These laws need to be relevant to the businesses of the twenty-first century, not limited to the businesses of five, six decades back. There is also a need to make sure that there is coherence among the stipulated laws. We are grateful that ILO Myanmar gained a better understanding of the state of businesses in the country, has agreed, extracted salient points of notable labour laws and published ILO Guide to Myanmar Labour Law in five languages - Myanmar, English, Korean, Chinese and Japanese - in 2017-18, which has been most helpful for the private sector. Myanmar has progressed with National Action Plan on the elimination of child labour with key activities and strategies, such as improve access to quality education and vocational education, updated and coherent legal and regulatory framework with implementation enforcement, provide support to children withdrawn from worse form of child labour practice, etc. All targeted to be realized by 2023. Congrats to tripartite work of Ministries concerned, workers, employers and to ILO for the guidance. We cooperated with the Minister of Industry and recent, over 40,000 small, medium enterprises and industries registered, among hundreds of thousands exist, employing workers approximately 10 times of the enterprises. Formalization of the non-formal sector is in the interest of employers, which we believe provides both businesses and workers protection of the law. With the initiative ACT/EMP, the Myanmar Chamber has conducted Women in Business survey early this year. The survey showed that the most significant barrier was the view that women had more family responsibilities than men, and the most in-demand supportive or corrective measure was assigning for women managers more responsibilities. In labour intensive garment industry, over 90 per cent employed are women. They are profound evidence of basic sewing workers upgraded to lower, upper, middle management and even to top management regardless of their level of education. In support of Women at Work, it is suggested that another set of survey to be conducted collecting data on how many of them have worked their way up, how and what assistance to be provided to facilitate the process. This can be used as showcase to encourage all women at work. Being the employers from a country that is under two stages of transition, we are travelling a rollercoaster journey in search of industrial peace. Even if all the statements that I have made today come to realization, which is the unavoidable duty and responsibility of tripartite constituents, together with constructive support of other stakeholders, I am confident the time is not that far to achieve what we all are after. Please, from long awaiting industrial peace to long live industrial peace for us and for the world of work. I thank you.

Mr Thailuan

Worker (Thailand)

Madam Chairperson, thank you for giving me an honour to speak on behalf of the trade union from Thailand. The work committee, the report of the ILO DG for the women at work consentally [sic] and the worker delegate who is taking care of more than 5 million women workers. I would like to share the situation in Thailand. In Thailand, female workforce is supporting the country economy most helpfully, and I think a lot of the gender problem is not only the old tradition and social norm that considers a woman as a second-class citizen but also because of the female workers themselves who strongly believe in that idea. They believe men are more superior. In many societies, they believe that male make a better leader of the family than the woman does. They work and share the same amount of responsibility. The majority of the women workers is the blue-collar workers, working in the low to the middle level. The opportunity to grow in their career path is low. [vgr INAUDIBLE 2:11] highly educated female employees can make an advancement in their career. The successful moment is [vgr INAUDIBLE 2:25] assumes to be the single and diverse. Many people who still believe in the old social norm can even say something hurtful about them like no man can stand [vgr INAUDIBLE 2:47] a woman. It is a very [vgr INAUDIBLE 2:49] for blue-collar workers to have an opportunity to develop and advance their career paths. They can only be supervisors. That is the most that they can be. To be at the executive level is almost impossible for them. It is because that the social belief or the gender bias always coming up in their head and on top of that. The low pay salary also play a big part to bring their self-esteem down. We have the type of union activities, try our best to promote equality in the workplace and encouraging women not to underestimate themselves. We develop the knowledge base [vgr INAUDIBLE 3:52] a leadership scheme for them as well as encouraging female workers to be committee members at the tripartite level. The only way to promote gender equality for us is to encourage female workers to leave the old social value behind, to change their attitude and to believe that they are worth the same as male workers. It is the only solution I can think of. Another area that we have to pay more attention to is sexual harassment in the workplace, which has a direct impact on the victim such as anger, fear, depression, more of the misbehaviours and significant [vgr INAUDIBLE 4:54] and properly resolve it. This also due to the weakness of the labour protection law which they mention only a few words and without guidelines for the prevention and liberty of such behaviours. The victim may be [vgr INAUDIBLE 5:19] action for bringing the claim. Thank you for giving me a chance to share my thoughts on this issue. [vgr INAUDIBLE 5:38]. Thank you, Madam.

Government (Namibia)

Thank you very much, Chairperson. Ladies and gentlemen, Namibia congratulates you, Mr President, and the entire Bureau on your election to steer the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. The sessions adopted by the ILO, ILC are particularly important to Namibia as one of the only countries in the world whose national Constitution directs that the state must act in accordance with the Conventions and the Recommendations of the ILO. Our Government has initiated key programmes in cooperation with the ILO to drastically upgrade the public employment service to effectively coordinate employment creation and to introduce a nation of minimum wage. In addition, the objective of the employment creation has been included in the new United Nations Namibia Partnership Framework Agreement in order to strengthen coordination across sectors. Namibia is also close to establishing the National Social Security Pension Fund. Mr President, Namibia applauds the Director-General for his report on the Women at Work Centenary Initiative. My Government agrees with the five building blocks identified by the DG for a new push for equality, namely expansion of the care economy, valuing the work of women fairly, improving women's control of their time, raising women's voice and representation, and ending violence and harassment in the world of work. We think that there is a need for the ILO to hold an expert meeting on the care economy with a view to employment creation and decent work in this sector. We also advocate including protection for persons in non-standard and informal forms of employment, in which women predominate, in all future Conventions. Namibia, in 1998, promulgated the Affirmative Action Employment Act. This piece of legislation promotes equal opportunity in employment and women are part of the designated group. In the political arena, the ruling party, Swapo, adopted the 50-50 gender balance policy. This policy is in line with the SDG 5, target 5.5, that ensures women's full and effective participation and equal opportunities for leadership at all levels of the decision-making in political, economic and public life. His Excellency Dr Hage Geingob, President of the Republic of Namibia, will receive today the African Excellence Award for the African Gender Award due to his continued effort to establish a legal and a policy framework for the promotion and the protection of women's rights in Namibia. This distinction will be awarded by the network Gender Is My Agenda Campaign, GIMAC. Despite all these achievements, a lot still needs to be done. In addition, the Government has commenced a three-year programme with ILO assistance, consisting of gender training for Ministry staff and social partners, gender assessment of the Ministry's work and the mainstreaming of gender responsible programme in the implementation of Namibia's National Employment Policy. Namibia's second Decent Work Country Programme, which will be signed by the DG when he visits Namibia in early August this year, will aim for ratification of the Family Responsible Convention 1981, number 156, and the maternity protection Convention 2000, number 183. We will conduct a time-use survey to support the policy formulation to enable women to have greater control of their time and a greater access to labour market. Namibia will assume the chair of the SADC in August this year. As part of the ILO centenary celebration, Namibia is committed to include a segment on the Women at Work initiative on the agenda for the annual meeting of SADC Ministers of labour and employment and social partners in early 2019. My Government is actively participating in the committee discussions this year on a standard setting on ending violence and harassment in the world of work and look forward to the adoption of a path through Convention in the area next year. Finally, my President, we reiterate Namibia's solidarity with the Palestinian people and will stand by them in their legitimate struggle for independent and sovereign Palestine State. I thank you.

---

Government (Bahamas)

Madam Chair, all the executives of the ILO and distinguished delegates to this 107th conference, good afternoon. I bring remarks on behalf of Senator The Honourable Dion A Foulkes, Minister of Labour of the Commonwealth of the Bahamas. "On behalf of the government of the Bahamas, I wish to congratulate you, Mr President, and your Vice-Presidents on your election as Chairman and Vice-Chairman, respectively, of this 107th conference. I am certain that colleague ministers, particularly from the Caribbean region, are assured that under your able leadership this session will be extremely productive. Mr President and Vice-Presidents, due to a horrific accident that recently occurred in the Bahamas, I am unable to attend this session. I stand with mixed emotions and I am sad to report that on Friday, June 1, during the Labour Day celebrations, a tragic accident occurred on the parade which resulted in deaths of 4 trade unionists and 25 being injured. Consequently, our nation is now in a state of mourning as we try to recover from the loss of lives and heal the scars that will forever be remembered. We ask the delegates to keep the people of the Bahamas in your thoughts and your prayers, and in particular, the members of the Bahamas Financial Services Union who were directly impacted by this accident. Ladies and gentlemen, during the 106th Session, my Government announced that, in conjunction with the Social Partners, we plan a series of incentives aimed at improving the standard of living and quality of life for workers in the Bahamas, and in particular, reducing the level of unemployment among the youth. To this end, we have undertaken the following steps. Launched a series of job fairs dubbed "Labour on the Blocks" whereby the Department of Labour, in partnership with the business community, holds six job fairs in community parks in New Providence and Grand Bahama. This initiative has resulted in over 8,500 persons being added to the employment skill database and employment opportunities for 100 Bahamians. Appointment to a select committee on skills, employment and training aimed to ensure that all training institutions in the country are working closely with the private sector to develop a national training strategy for Bahamian workers. Over the next 12 months, my Ministry will focus on additional measures to reduce the high level of unemployment and ensure that a cordial relationship exists with our social partners by enhancing legislation to empower the Bahamas Industrial Tribunal to enforce its ruling and decisions, ensuring that all heads of agreement recognize workers' rights. Further, amending section 20 of the Industrial Relations Act to facilitate the ILO Recommendation on trade union independence. The Department of Labour will complete the decentralization process to ensure that citizens have better access to its services. It is anticipated by August of 2018 residents in New Providence will have access to three sub-offices which will all be equipped as a one-stop-shop centre, based on international standards, offering full cadre of services to the job seekers. Finally, Mr President and Vice-Presidents, I wish to express my heartfelt congratulations to Mr Guy Ryder, Director-General of the ILO, for his leadership of this great organization and to recommit the full support of the Government of the Bahamas as you execute your duties in this time of office. God bless the ILO and God bless the Commonwealth of the Bahamas." Thank you.

Worker (Cyprus)

Ladies and gentlemen, please allow me on behalf of the Cyprus Workers' Confederation to congratulate the ILO for choosing this very important topic for discussion, as well as the Director-General for a most comprehensive report setting footing for a genuine discussion under which social partners could promote socially justified approaches. Despite the fact that equality in employment is a long-lasting issue of concern and that numerous steps forward have been made in various strategies, and legislative and policy measures have been introduced, promoted and implemented, there is still an evident distinction between theory and practice. It would not be an exaggeration to highlight the fact that the whole situation became even more difficult during the financial crisis since women were much more affected and harmed in relation to employment, remunerations and fringe benefits, work-life balance in precarious and non-regulated employment. The ongoing growth and financial recovery indicate once again the need to set a more ambitious, yet again promising and well necessary strategic plan in establishing a more applicable framework in support of equality and work-life balance issues. Indeed, the financial crisis has badly affected economic balances, but at the same it did harm regulation of the labour market, social policy and social justice. It goes without saying that the financial crisis itself, especially in countries like the Republic of Cyprus, having tried to go through a Memorandum of Understanding regulated by the Troika, could be an answer or partly the answer as to why things have slowed down on the issues related to equality. However, this could also be just an excuse for not being able to move things distinctively forward, especially on enterprise level. Thus, unfortunately, we still seek to face realities which relate to the glass ceiling, the glass wall, the sticky floor and the glass cliff. At the same time, special note and concern should be given to challenges deriving from new forms of employment which promote further deregulation of the labour market, including atypical employment as well as digitalization, an issue which needs much further and in-depth discussion, which seems to mainly affect women in the labour market, creating at the same time social isolation, further pay gap and less democracy in the labour market. If we need to refer to a number of good practices, please allow me to highlight a recent development resulting through bipartite and a perspective tripartite cooperation in Cyprus, leading to the design and to an agreement of a code soon to be incorporated in collective agreement, dealing with tackling sexual harassment and violence in employment. More importantly, since it is clear throughout the whole Report of the Director-General that the push for equality is urgently needed, it is essential to indicate and promote specific measures in tackling the problem. We do not need, of course, to reinvent the wheel, but it would be helpful if we: focus in designing and promoting specific in-house training and vocational programmes, as well as research studies, in an attempt to improve information spread and to create an appropriate culture; deepen and widen the legal framework on equality, the European Commission proposed directive to support work-life balance for parents and carers needs to be adapted by the Council of the European Union in order to provide adequate solutions for the needs of modern societies; provide a specific tangible and attainable roadmap in achieving certain goals related to equality and employment, and governments and social partners should acquire a centre role in designing and promoting social policies supported by public finances; establish new, and strengthen existing institutions, bodies and committees, promoting and monitoring equality involving social partners in the wider civil society, giving special emphasis in women's participation in order to be able to reach more balanced decisions; and of course, include or improve equality issues and clauses in collective agreements and work-related arrangements. Madam Chair, after all, human nature does not change, but when people accept the same rules and the same institutions to make sure they're applied, their behaviour towards each other changes. This is a process of civilization itself. Sustainability in employment and work needs a solid ground of policies promoting equality and equal opportunities between men and women and, of course, ending all forms of discrimination against women. Closing gender gaps in employment is a prerequisite in reaching decent work as a driver of sustainable development in the framework of the 2030 Agenda. In concluding, let us all realize that gender equality is not a women's issue but rather a concern to all, and it should go without saying that attaining gender parity does not lead to a zero sum gain, but it creates instead the necessary and appropriate conditions for establishing a more democratic and balanced society and labour market. The challenge is ahead, especially on EU level, and we need to put the European Pillar of Social Rights in practice. At least it's worth a try in giving a new impetus and another push for equality. Thank you.

Ms Eltsova

Government (Russian Federation)

Madam Chair, colleagues, increasing prosperity and employment, and improving the quality of education and healthcare are issues which concern the inhabitants of all countries in the world. The Russian Federation is taking a comprehensive approach to achieve the UN and the ILO's SDGs. This includes a long-term strategic plan for the country's socio-economic development and the implementation of legislative standards for labour and jobs and also guaranteeing tripartite dialogue. In our country, when developing our long-term economic policy, we take into account standards and developments in social policy. We have long-term programmes in place for the implementation of social policies such as the programme promoting jobs and the education programme. It is important to create high-skill jobs which guarantee high social standards. In 2018, in our country, we began to implement the programme increasing productivity and supporting jobs. As a result, the State is providing consultancy services for employers and providing professional development opportunities for employees, and also measures to promote jobs for the unemployed. These measures have led to the achievement of the following economic indicators. In 2017, there was a growth of 7.3 per cent in real terms in the nominal average wage over 2016 levels. That's 3.5 per cent in real terms. On 1 May 2018, a federal law entered into force introducing a minimum wage at the level of the minimum subsistence level, which is 26.3 per cent of the average wage in the Russian Federation. We have seen unemployment registered at 1 per cent at the end of April 2018. That is 785,000 people. We have also seen a dynamic increase in demand for workers. There were 1.5 million vacancies registered with the employment service at the end of April. In order to streamline the social partners' efforts, we have signed a general agreement between the All-Russian Trade Union Association and the All-Russian Employers Association and the Government of the Russian Federation for the period 2018 to 2020. This agreement includes the major directions for the development of labour issues in Russia. Another important issue which I would like to note in my speech, and which is a very important issue, is increasing women's rights. On the 8 March 2017, the Russian Federation adopted a National Action Strategy for Women from 2017-2022. This aims to improve the conditions to protect women's health, to improve their prosperity and to increase women's participation in political and social life. In developing social and economic policies in Russia, an important role is played by the cooperation programme between the Russian Federation and the ILO for the period up to 2020. Through this programme we receive information on best labour and social policy, and we are grateful to the ILO for the expert support it has provided us, and we hope our cooperation will be fruitful going forward. Thank you for the opportunity to speak today at this session. Thank you very much.

Mr Sohn

Employer (Republic of Korea)

Mr President and distinguished delegates, the Director-General addressed several gender inequality issues in this report, and those issues cannot be resolved quickly as they are tied to deeply rooted religious, cultural and historic values and customs of various countries. Nevertheless, giving everyone a fair opportunity to compete and be compensated fairly based on their performance must be a common goal that we must pursue together in the age of the Fourth Industrial Revolution. In Korea, although there has been a major increase in the number of women in the workforce, and their treatment in the workplace has improved over the years, there remains a noticeable 36 per cent wage gap between men and women. However, simply regarding this statistical difference as a sign of gender-based discrimination will not help resolve the issue. We need to clearly identify the cause of such a difference and come up with the appropriate measures to address those specific causes. The issue we are trying to resolve here is unfair discrimination solely based on gender not differences that exist for legitimate business reasons. In this regard, I would like to make a few proposals to the ILO and social partners. First of all, we should provide more opportunities for women to participate in the labour market. In order to do so, more jobs need to be created to accommodate the increased workforce. It is becoming increasingly difficult for companies to create new jobs because of oversupply and increased productivity and efficiency from improvements in digital technology. Now is the time for our member States to focus their labour policies on creating new jobs through start-ups. To make this happen, we must part with outdated regulations that serve as a hindrance to new business development. Secondly, we should help women stay longer in the workforce. As of the last year, an average tenure with their current employer for Korean women is 4.7 years. This number is only 65 per cent of the average for Korean men, which is 7.3 years. In addition, only 23 per cent of Korean women have careers spanning ten or more years, compared to 41 per cent for Korean men. Career interruption due to childbirth and care for women is the main reasons for such differences. Therefore, the companies must lead the efforts to provide a better work-life balance for women. Women should not be forced to choose between work and family life. Further, we have to establish a wage system that provides compensation based on performance and the value of work if we want to realize the principle of equal pay for men and women for work of equal value. In Korea, 63 per cent of businesses with 100 or more employees will utilize a seniority-based wage system where the wage goes up automatically every year, and this practice contributes directly to the wage gap between men and women because men have far longer average tenure than women, as I mentioned earlier. In recent days, I'd like to note that Korean companies have begun to step up their efforts to break the glass ceilings by increasing the proportion of women executives, for instance. I believe this is a very meaningful development and a step in the right direction towards securing future competitiveness and sustainable growth. Finally, let me close by asking the ILO for its continued commitment and efforts to find, share and implement the best practices regarding workplace equality. Thank you for your attention.

Government (Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela)

Thank you, Madam Chair. It is my honour to present this statement on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement countries as President and Chair of the Movement, Geneva Chapter. Chair, the Ministries of Labour of the Non-Aligned Movement are committed to the ILO objectives and principles and express thanks to the Director-General of the organization for his efforts to make the ILO a centre of excellence. The Non-Aligned Movement, NAM, is awaiting the results of the Committee on Violence and Harassment in the World of Work. NAM takes note of the report on social dialogue and tripartism. As part of the 2030 Agenda and the Sustainable Development Goals, NAM also expresses thanks for the document World Employment and Social Outlook: Trends 2018 and notes with concern that unemployment globally has surpassed more than 192 million. In 2019, the number of unemployed will increase by 1.3 million. Since the growth rate of the labour force exceeds employment creation, the Movement urges the Director-General to continue with his efforts for the ratification of the Instrument for Amendment of 1986 to the ILO Constitution and urges member States that if not ratified it, to do so. NAM appreciates the efforts of the Office to strengthen its supervisory system in the ILO. The Committee on the Application of Standards, the selection of individual cases, has to respect a balance between the four regions and the different Conventions. The list has to be balanced with respect to the core Conventions, the technical Conventions and the governments' ones. NAM recognizes the importance of the 2030 Agenda, specifically SDG 8, which promotes inclusive and sustainable economic growth, full and productive employment, decent work for all, the protection of labour rights and the promotion of safety at work. The Movement reiterates that the right to development is an inalienable, intrinsic, interrelated and interdependent human right, and the realization of this right could promote the achievement of all of the SDGs, in particular SDG 8. NAM expresses thanks for the General Survey on the instruments concerning working time, considering that the number of hours worked and rest periods have important consequences for workers and employees. The Movement repeats that the unilateral measures of coercion jeopardize human rights, including the right to development and the right to work. NAM opposes and condemns these measures and urges States that apply them to revoke them completely and immediately. NAM underscores the challenges that countries face when hosting a large number of refugees, particularly in the labour markets, and asks the office and the international community to increase their support and assistance to those countries in keeping with the principle of burden sharing. The Movement takes note of the report on the Women at Work Initiative and its contribution to development of rich and emerging economies. The Movement contends the military occupation lasting more than 50 years in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Eastern Jerusalem, a territory which constitutes the State of Palestine. NAM expresses thanks for the recent visit of the Director-General of the ILO to the occupied Palestinian territories, the first visit in two decades by a Director-General of the ILO. The Movement is deeply concerned by the Israeli occupation, the stagnation in the peace process, the persistence of political instability and the worsening of the humanitarian crisis in Gaza. The unemployment rate there is higher than 40 per cent, the highest in the world. NAM is pleased to note the Report of the Director-General of the ILO on the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories and expresses its major concern with respect to the violation of human rights as perpetrated by Israel, the occupying power. The Movement supports the efforts to unite the Palestinian national struggle and establish an independent State of Palestine with Eastern Jerusalem as its capital, and it expresses its support to the people of Palestine to exercise their rights to self-determination, national independence, sovereignty and the right of return. NAM also urges the Director-General of the ILO to pursue his efforts with international donors in order to obtain financial support for the fund and social progress and economic progress of the Palestinian people. NAM is very pleased to play its constructive participation during the discussions on the subjects on the agenda of this 107th International Labour Conference. Thank you.

Employer (Lao People's Democratic Republic)

Excellency Chairperson, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, it is my great honour to represent today the Lao National Chamber of Commerce and Industry, or LNCCI, and as a representative of Lao Employers, in line with our Government supporting or fulfilling the SDGs, in this case SDG 8, promote sustain inclusive and sustainable economic growth, full and productive employment and decent work for all. We at LNCCI, as the apex private sector organization in Laos, are proud to participate in the discussion and the implementation of the strategies, plans and activities led by our Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, especially in regards to the implementation of the range of the Country Decent Works Programme in alignment with the scope of the ILO. Ladies and gentlemen, working to promote empowerment of business growth as well as its sustainability is a very important contribution to the development of the social and economic growth of Lao PDR in order to achieve the goal of leading the nation to be graduated from the LDC in 2020. To achieve these objective and goals, we would like to emphasize the inclusivity and the participation of women and their contribution to the economic and social development programme. Their contributions are so invaluable and help greatly in leapfrogging the achievements and completion of our goals and targets. We also would like to support the Women at Work and focus on strengthening industry relations in the tripartite cooperation. The Chamber of Commerce and Industry, representing the business community in Laos, sees the importance of the promotion and development of sustainable business, as shown by our involvement in boosting business compliance with the law and regulations, as well as the protection of rights and benefits of the communities in the business sector. Together, we encourage business growth, employment, innovation and CSR, which is seen by a variety of projects and services activities such as the Lao Business Forum, the Lao SMEs and Asian Business Awards, the set-up of Small and Medium Enterprise Promotion and service centres, Lao Branding Facility Centres, Women's Entrepreneurial Centre, which provides various training, seminars and workshops for our members which focus in encouraging women and young entrepreneurship start-ups, staff and workers participations. Distinguished guests, LNCCI has a key duty to help protection of the benefit of its member and support and promote both local and foreign investment in Laos. The National Chamber has paid great effort in encouraging decent work to Lao workforce countrywide. On the other hand we also promote tripartite cooperation for better industry relations in the workplace for protection of women and men at work without any discrimination. We work closely in the tripartite in improving the livelihood of the workers by focusing on issues such as minimum wages, skill development, work matching and planning for various actual and ad hoc industry needs, occupation safety and health, labour market needs, as well as vocational and skills training. Similarly, we also implement surveys and studies related to employment throughout the years and also provide feedback, comments and input to concern law and policymakers in relevant field and sectors. Once again, to conclude my note on behalf of the LNCCI and the Lao Employers, I would like to thank the ILO for the support, both tactical and financial assistance, in the implementation of activities related to Lao Employers in the past, and we look forward to more cooperation, fruitful and successful activities in the near and long-term future together. I would like to wish all delegates a great success in your work, happiness to you and your family, wish the 107th International Labour Conference a great success. Thank you.

Mr Bugeja

Worker (Malta)

Distinguished President, distinguished delegates, since its creation the International Labour Organization has played a central role in promoting tripartism and social dialogue between or among representatives of workers, employers and governments on issues of common interest relating to economic and social policies. It is also the core instrument in promoting better living and working conditions as well as social justice. In the debate over the impact of globalization and the distribution of costs and benefits of global economic change, social partners have a crucial role to play to draw attention to its social effects and to ways of jointly addressing them. Successful social dialogue and collective bargaining structures and processes have the potential to encourage good governance, advance social and industrial stability, boost economic progress and create decent and quality jobs. The diffusion of new business models and the increasing automation and digitization of work are changing the typical employment relationship based on which social dialogue, industrial relations and trade unions management cooperation have historically been built on. The diversification of work, such as jobs in the online platform economy, and the continuing rise of non-standard forms of employment, pose challenges of representation and inclusiveness. These challenges are further aggravated by technological advances, demographic shifts, climate change and deepening globalization. Without a strong and effective social dialogue structure, unscrupulous employers will continue to exploit and abuse workers' rights. Presently in Malta, we are experiencing a robust economic growth of about 6 per cent annually. This was achieved through various active labour market policies which brought unemployment to the lowest level ever recorded. There are around 43,000 foreign workers and employment levels are nearing the 100,000 gainfully occupied. We have also registered an economic surplus for the second consecutive year, which resulted in a significant decrease in public debt. Last year, average wages have increased by about 6 per cent when compared to 2016, and those in risk of poverty have decreased drastically. This rapid economic expansion and the growing population have put pressure on the infrastructure needs and higher housing prices and rents. Social dialogue is proactive and dynamic at all levels. During the past few years, the Government strived to include trade unions and employers' organization in issues related to labour, economic and social policies. Social partners represented at the Malta Council for Economic and Social Development and the Employment Relations Board responded by taking a more active and decisive part. The historic agreement reached last year on the increase in the minimum wage, the enactment of various labour legislations, the increase in family-friendly measures and the involvement of social partners in shaping and contributing in the European semester illustrate the level of social dialogue. The Maltese industrial relations system is very decentralized and unfolds at enterprise level. It could be said that Maltese industrial relations system has moved closer to consensual ethic in which the spirit of cooperation prevails over the 'us and them' dichotomy of interrelationships. Workplace cooperation is strong and complements the normal collective bargaining. It has to be admitted though that we do not always agree on all issues as employees and employers, in some cases, have different views. However, such disagreement does not threaten the fundamental willingness to seek solutions rather than confrontation. In our pursuit to attain better working and living conditions, the General Workers Union, as one of the main Maltese social partners, is constantly engaged in the development of collective agreements and national policies. This resulted in an improvement in pay, working conditions, health and safety, family-friendly measures and a more inclusive workplace. After 12 years of lobbying by the General Workers Union, the Government started to gradually give back to all employees those public holidays which fall on a weekend. Even if social dialogue works well in Malta, we still have our challenges. I have always stated that the eradication of precarious work is not a destination but a journey, and this year the General Workers Union embarked on a new and another campaign. We strongly believe in the principle of equal pay for a job of equal value. Therefore, we cannot accept the situation, especially in the private sector, where two employees performing the same job in the same workplace are paid differently because one is directly employed and the other is employed by a sub-contractor. In addition, we are lobbying for the abolition of all zero-hour contracts. This type of contract does not provide workers with any type of security and stability. This uncertainty means it's next to impossible for workers to properly plan their life and have a decent standard of living. Amending our national labour legislation to widen the concept of equal pay for a job of equal value at the same workplace and abolishing the zero-hour contracts would give a strong signal from the Government that job creation is not just about the numbers but most importantly the quality of jobs. Finally, this year's conference, on the eve of the ILO centenary, provided us with a unique opportunity to discuss and further enhance the importance and relevance of social dialogue and tripartism as a fundamental way to address the future world of work. Social justice is both ethically right and economically smart. Thank you.

Government (Botswana)

Mr President, I wish to commence my remarks by conveying my congratulations to you and the Vice-President for election to direct the proceedings of the 107th Session of the ILC. The Botswana delegation and I wish you the best in executing this important task. It is befitting that the ILO should dedicate time during the 107th Session of the ILC to reflect on the issue of gender equality. The Report of the Director-General shows that we are still a long way from achieving the goal of equality and that our progress towards it is too slow. It is a great disappointment that, despite numerous efforts by the constituents of the ILO and the achievements made by this organization in the pursuit of gender equality at work, we are still in a situation that is far from satisfactory. The commitment and vigour of the ILO to eliminate gender inequalities and discriminatory practices that hold women back are underscored by the complementary discussion of the issue of violence and harassment against men and women in the world of work during this session of the ILC. Undoubtedly, these are issues of critical importance, not only to governments and local partners but also to society as a whole. Violence and harassment do not only affect workers and their families but they also have adverse implications for productivity and socio-economic development. Success in overcoming violence and harassment at work requires the concerted efforts of everyone involved. Employers are duty-bound to create an environment that is not conducive to violence and harassment. It is necessary that an enabling legislative platform, that ensures that perpetrators account for their actions, is in place. To that end, we have put specific legal provisions in place to address gender-based violence in general and sexual harassment at the workplace in particular. The Domestic Violence of 2008 was enacted to protect survivors of domestic violence and provides a number of remedies, including interim and restraining orders. It defines various types of abuse and harassment in a comprehensive manner that goes beyond the home environment and covers the workplace. More specifically, the Public Service Act Of 2008 includes sexual harassment as a form of misconduct at the workplace. Section 38 provides as follows, and I quote, “For the purpose of this section, sexual harassment means any unwanted, unsolicited or repeated sexual advance, sexually derogatory statement, or sexually discriminatory remark made by an employee to another, whether made in or outside the workplace, which is offensive or objectionable to the recipient, which causes the recipient discomfort or humiliation or which the recipient believes interferes with the performance of his or her job security or prospects or creates a threatening or intimidating work environment.” Moreover, we have observed that empowerment and capacity building to enable workers to comprehend and appreciate issues pertaining to violence and harassment are a necessity. The Government therefore continues to ensure training of police, judges and others involved in the justice system on gender-based violence to further acquaint them with the skills needed to interpret the laws related to domestic violence as well as sensitivities of handling victims. Mr President, the Government of Botswana is committed to removing all structural barriers to gender equality. To this end, women's empowerment programmes have been put in place to create employment for women, improve skills, enhance access to credit from financial institutions and eradicate poverty amongst women. Botswana's Vision 2036 provides that by 2036 Botswana will be a society where all men and women have equal opportunity to actively participate in the economic, social, cultural and political development. The National Gender-Based Violence Strategy 2015-2020 provides a multi-pronged and multi-sectorial approach to the prevention and elimination of gender-based violence. Furthermore, the National Policy on Gender and Development, which was approved by the Government in March 2015, seeks to address the social inequalities in the country. Priority areas include prevention of poverty, promotion of economic development, social protection, democracy and protection of vulnerable groups. At a regional level, our country has signed the Revised SADC Gender Protocol for Gender and Development, in May 2017, which is a clear statement that the Government is committed to women empowerment, gender equality and elimination of discrimination against women. Mr President, the discussion on ILO development cooperation in support of the Sustainable Development Goals gives the ILO constituents an opportunity to reflect on the impact of the ILO Decent Work Agenda. As we participate in this discussion, it is important that we take stock of the progress made by ILO development cooperation in improving the lives of our people. We are duty bound to come up with initiatives that will equip the organization to understand and better respond to the challenges in the world of work. In so doing, the interests and needs of governments and the social partners should be guiding principles. For our part, we are engaging with social partners to review our employment laws and policies to ensure compliance with international obligations as well as create a modern, prosperous and competitive economy that is characterized by industrial and social stability. It is increasingly being realized by the international community that creation of productive employment is critical in the pursuit of sustainable development. Let us take advantage of this shared global conviction to reinforce partnerships and promote coherence of strategies that support employment creation. Reforms within the United Nations systems provide a conducive environment for placing our own strategy at the centre of United Nations system and more needs to be done to harness this opportunity. ### Employer (Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela)

On behalf of Fedecámaras, we greet the Director-General and welcome his dedication of his report to the impulse towards equality of women in the working place and the seven initiatives of the ILO Centenary Initiatives. Certainly, despite advances, there's much still to do to correct workplace discrimination and inequality towards women, particular as regards salaries. We accompany the struggle of the ILO to change structures and behaviours that are unjust to women. In Venezuela, the businessmen and directors are mainly men, and the women take to do with the house, and although most university students are women and there exists great participation by women in middle management, their representation in upper management is less than 1 per cent. To try to change this reality, Fedecámaras has decided to start a project to promote the business alliance to stimulate political companies of general equity and so bring greater benefits. Twentieth May last, there was a presidential election process which was brought forward. It was of dubious legitimacy. It was called by our National Assembly which was unconstitutional and incompetent to do so. The process developed under a high level of abstention. The Government was denounced for the use of mechanisms to compel voters, which justified serious questioning of the process by the community, both national and international. However, Venezuela is now in the middle of a profound economic crisis. A model imposed by the so-called Homeland Plan has destroyed the productive apparatus and jobs. According to official figures, between 1998 and now more than 40 per cent of businesses in the country have disappeared. Venezuela is short of food and medicines and is moving into a humanitarian crisis, which is contributed to by the crisis in public services, water, light, health and security. There are more than 1,500 businesses which have passed into the hands of the State, mostly unpaid or not productive. In the last two years, more than 44 multi-national businesses have closed or declared that they're stopping their operations in the country. The minimum monthly salary is hardly $1 at market value and needs $138 minimum of salary to get your basic family needs. According to a study by the three principal universities in 2017, poverty got to 87 per cent and extreme poverty to 61 per cent. In the last year, 64 per cent of the population lost on average 11 kilos, and 80 per cent are declared in alimentary insecurity. It's not strange that migration of about 3 million Venezuelans, according to official figures, has taken place. The relation of work for its part is the object of political mismanagement. It's pretending to replace unions which are freely elected by workers' productive committees installed by the Government in business. Its insisting on the thesis of a supposed economic war, the taking of businesses, the criminalization of business people, and instead of combatting inflation, bringing order to public spending, correcting deviations in the fiscal monetary exchange is difficult. It's a difficult time for Venezuela, and we don't have any more time to lose. Thank you.

Worker (France)

President of the conference, Vice-Presidents, Director-General, ladies and gentlemen, in the name of French workers from old trade unions in an old country and in an old continent that some would like to define as being representative of an old world, I wish to now reaffirm here the symbols and values that are so essential, and as well as the importance of the mandate of social justice and the defence of the rights of man of the ILO. It seems, according to some, that our world, our models and our achievements for the benefit of the workers of the world should be revoked, and that we, trade unions, would be dinosaurs on the verge of extinction who have not yet understood the changes that are affecting our societies. In this globalized world, modernity would be under the full power of the market in which neither social nor environmental values would have a place. This would be a world with a unique vision. Every man would fight for himself in a jungle of competitiveness. It would be a world without values. However, for centuries now, values structure countries. They structure nations, and they enable populations to fulfil their needs and live together. Once again, in the country of the rights of man, freedom, equality, fraternity, solidarity, that is indeed is modernity. No, modernity is not a situation in which the attacks against a freedom of association are rising, because without workers' organizations as well as independent employers' organizations who have the necessary guarantees to promote the rights of their member and social progress for all, this will not be ideal. Indeed, the principle itself of tripartism would be meaningless. We must continue to actively contribute to the development of trade unionism, which should be free and independent in the world, and we should fight tirelessly against all forms of dictatorship. No, modernity is not a situation in which, in the twenty-first century in the world of work that was created for and by men, there should be no room for women who are regularly victims of underpayment, victims of psychological or sexual harassment. The French workers support the principle of zero tolerance called for by the Director-General of the ILO, and we call you solemnly to adopt a Convention and a Recommendation on equality and sexist violence of work. Modernity is not a situation in which, under the pretext of flexibility and precarity due to digitalization, the first Convention of the ILO on working time is called into question. Indeed, this happened nearly one century ago, and in those days already this Convention had enshrined workers' international demand for a workday of eight hours in order to enable them to enjoy a work-life balance. No, modernity is not a situation in which 1 per cent of the world's population possesses 82 per cent of the wealth generated in the world. The fair distribution of wealth must become a reality and particularly to pay workers. Indeed, international solidarity must grow because it alone is able to eradicate the extreme poverty in the world. It is now time that these values must be defended. They must be protected. We must demand social progress. We must fight against inequalities, and we are proud, therefore, to be of the old world. In a world which is cracking at the seams, it is important to be in conflict with this modernity in which we must remain defensive of social justice and human rights. More than ever before, the need for global social regulation is required when the workers of the world are in competition with social standards which are being chipped away at. It is high time that the ILO, the social conscience of humanity, be recognized and considered as the main guardian of workers' rights. More than ever before, French workers are highlighting their firm wish to achieve social progress which is real, ensuring the improvement of their living conditions for work and working conditions. More than ever before, the standards of the ILO, fruit of the fight for a fairer society, have become topical issues today. Work is not a merchandise. They must be considered a public asset. More than ever before, we are the guardians of an ideal. We are the guardians of a conscience. Our great responsibility and honour is to do all in our power to fight for these.

Government (Viet Nam)

Excellency Mr Chair, Mr Guy Ryder, distinguished Ministers, Heads of delegations, ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of the Government's delegation of the Socialist Republic of Viet Nam, I would like to send my best compliments to Mr Chair, Mr Director-General of the ILO, all Excellency, Ministers and distinguished delegates. Distinguished participants, we highly appreciate and strongly support the ILO Centenary Initiative Women at Work: The push for equality, which supplements policy instruments for the promotion of equality with new and innovative approaches for global social justice. Viet Nam is fully aware of the role and contribution of female workers to common prosperity and sustainable development. Therefore, ensuring the rights of women at work is one of the priorities of the Government of Viet Nam. This has been demonstrated through the enactment of laws and policies to facilitate women in general, and women entrepreneurs in particular, in capacity building, management, leadership skill enhancement and more access to capital and the market. One of the priorities highlighted in the National Strategy for Gender Equality 2011-2020 of Viet Nam is to reduce the gender gaps in the economy, labour and employment to strengthen the accessibility of poor rural women, ethnic minority women to economic resources in the labour market. Programmes and projects on vocational education, employment and occupational safety on sustainable poverty reduction and on support women start-ups have created opportunities and favourable conditions for the women's access to employment opportunities, get out of poverty and enhance their economic empowerment. Given those efforts, female workers now account for 48.1 of the total 54.8 million workers. The ratio of women's participation in the labour force is 72 per cent. Women's representation in business administration and management stands at over 25 per cent. The gender gaps and labour force participation and income have been remarkably improved. At the third decade of the twenty-first century, globalization and the Fourth Industrial Revolution is creating opportunities to promote economic cooperation but also posing challenges and difficulties, especially for women. Women are increasingly at risk of being excluded from the formal economy or having less choices of employment. It is therefore important to raise awareness of the whole society about the role, potentials of women and the need to promote women human resources development. On that basis, we promote the status of women, gender equality, strengthening gender mainstreaming and to the development and implementation of policies on human resources development all over the country. From the regional and international perspective, Viet Nam has actively and proactively launched a variety of initiatives to promote women's status, especially their training, and it is now collaborating with APEC economies to implement the APEC Gender Inclusion Guidelines, ensuring gender equality as a task in the 2030 Agenda on Sustainable Development of the UN. These are important frameworks to promote women's roles and contributions, strengthening cooperation and development globally. Ladies and gentlemen, Mr Chair, recently Viet Nam has adopted two resolutions on social insurance and wage reforms of the country. These lay important foundations for the National Assembly, the Government and social partners of Viet Nam to conduct profound reforms on social insurance and wage industrial relations policies. During the process of developing these two significant documents, Viet Nam has received effective technical assistance from the ILO. Besides cooperation activities and the revision of the labour code in specific example areas such as gender equality, industrial relations, vocational education, occupational safety and so on, have also been very effective, making an important contribution to an improved capacity of the Government and social partners. In the time to come, Viet Nam hopes to receive further support from the ILO and its member countries in the following areas, legal revision and implementation, particularly in terms of policies related to social insurance and industrial relations, social dialogue mechanism strengthening, the study and ratification of ILO Conventions, particularly core Conventions, as well as, finally, the implementation of the Decent Work Country Programme 2017-2021. For our part, Viet Nam shall make all possible efforts to best fulfil our membership responsibility and continue to maintain and promote the fruitful cooperation between the ILO and its tripartite partners in Viet Nam. I wish you, Mr Chair, Mr Director-General, Ministers and all delegates, good health and success. Thank you very much.

Mr Ounlasy

Worker (Lao People's Democratic Republic)

Your Excellency, Chairman of the 107th International Labour Conference, Mr Guy Ryder, Director-General of the International Labour Organization, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, it is my great pleasure to participate in and share my perspective to the ILC this year, which is an important meeting especially for the trade unions and workers across the world. The ILO has been working actively with its member States, through a tripartite mechanism, in order to ensure a fair society, enhance sound industrial relations between workers and employers, and work cooperatively and collectively to reduce labour disputes, and all the economy's related areas. On behalf of the workers of the People's Democratic Republic of Lao, I would like to express my congratulations for the Report of the Director-General of the ILO on the achievements, challenges and ways forward to resolve the future challenges of the world of work led by the ILO, especially this year's report on The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality. The Lao Federation of Trade Unions, as a representative of the Lao workers and one of the tripartite organizations in Lao PDR, wishes to express our sincere efforts to work closely with the government of Lao PDR, represented by the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare and the employers' representative, the Lao National Chamber of Commerce and Industry, in the collective efforts of the effective implementation of the ILO Conventions, which Lao PDR has ratified. The Lao Federation of Trade Unions has also revised the trade union law and the related regulations, to ensure the alignment with the ratified Conventions and the Lao labour law, in contribution with the social protection and promotion of decent work in Lao PDR. Distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, the Lao Federation of Trade Unions has placed important attention to exercise its mandates as the representative organization of the Lao workers. In particular, we have disseminated and encouraged awareness raising on laws and regulations relating to labour issues. We have provided mobile awareness raising to workers and employers on safety and health, encouraged collective agreements and collective bargaining agreements. We have protected migrant workers. We have participated in national skills development and employment promotion. The Lao Federation of Trade Unions has also worked actively with the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare and the Lao National Chamber of Commerce and Industry on other labour-related issues on the national agenda. The Lao Federation of Trade Unions has implemented several activities to promote social benefits and contribute to the country's social and economic development. Concerning the prevention and elimination of violence and harassment in workplaces, this union has also worked closely within the tripartite mechanism to revise the related laws and regulations. We also conduct a series of awareness raising campaigns and activities, for employers and workers, aiming to achieve the elimination of the violence and harassment issue step by step. On this important occasion, on behalf of the Lao Federation of Trade Unions, I would like to express my sincere gratitude and appreciation to the ILO for its continuous support to us, both financial and technical assistance to our office, which enables us to carry out our activities to protect the rights and interests of Lao workers, and we are committed to continuously support and actively cooperate with the ILO to ensure the protection and interests of the workers in the country. Thank you very much.

Mr Parkhouse

Employer (Namibia)

Mr Chairman, may I join previous speakers in congratulating you on your appointment as chairperson of this conference. Colleagues, fellow delegates, the Namibian Employers' Federation is proud to have been attending this conference every year since the independence of our country 28 years ago, and without reservation we support the work of the ILO. We are grateful to the ILO for all the support that we as a country have received and we, the NEF, have received through ACT/EMP. We also support all the efforts of our Government, on a tripartite level, to eradicate poverty and to create employment. We, the NEF, have recently completed research on the EESE programme, the Enabling Environment for Sustainable Enterprises, and we will shortly be releasing the report. It is our aim and our challenge to ensure that the recommendations are promoted and actioned on a broad private sector and that we must persuade our Government that serious streamlining of much legislation is required to enable business to develop and thus to create more employment. And we must together, on a tripartite basis, look at the recommended ways to create that enabling environment for sustainable enterprises. For out of sustainable enterprises comes sustainable jobs, and that is what we need. We note the DG's report and the need to promote gender equality in the workplace and the need to ensure that women are treated equally. The NEF, since its establishment, has promoted and valued the presence of women in the workplace, especially in the higher managerial levels. We continue to promote this ideology today. The DG's report also refers to the Future of Work, and we welcome the Commission that is working on this project. If one thinks back ten years or more, how many of today's jobs did not exist? I recall, not so many years ago, when I chased a fax salesman out of my office, "What do I need one of those things for?" Today, the fax is basically obsolete. Today, instantaneous email communication at all hours of the night and day is the norm. Last year, outside this building, there were no bays for recharging of electric cars. Today, we must move ahead and plan for the future, but we must not forget the basics of education. It does not help anyone to have a university degree if the basics of reading and arithmetic are not there. We must think out of the box and be prepared to accept change, and we must, as the DG said, "Welcome technology and ensure that we use it, not that it uses us." I love the DG's comment last week, "We must ensure that the Future of Work is based on the four Ds. No more drudgery. No more dirt. No more danger. No more deprivation". That is what the future should look like. That is the future that we should aim for. We must ensure at the same time that all workers are covered for social security, unemployment, sickness and old age pension. This will not be easy because the immediate question will be who's going to finance it? That issue must be worked out on an equitable, tripartite basis, sharing the load of funding between the workers and the employers, each according to his or her means. Note that I have only referred to employers and workers, because they are the ones who fund government and thus, in the end, it is only the two social partners, workers and employers, who actually do the funding. Mr Chairman, next year the ILO will be 100 years old, and Namibia and my organization, the NEF, will only be 29 years old, but we look forward to going forward, hand in hand, to ensure a better future for our children and their children. I thank you.

Mr Elisa

Government (Eritrea)

Ladies and gentlemen, I'm delighted to deliver a speech on behalf of my delegation in this conference, and seizing to this opportunity, I appreciate and thank the reports presented by the Chairperson of the Governing Body and the ILO Director-General, which urges for renewed spirit of tripartism to tackle the world of work challenges with focus at application of standards, development cooperation, workplace violence, women at work and social dialogue. The Government of the State of Eritrea, in accordance with the Director-General's call to tackle decent work deficit, believes the success of any nation depends fully upon the development of its human resource, which is healthy, skilled and committed manpower, in contributing to the development of a country. When these human resources are accompanied by peace and stability, it will boost more to the development of a nation. Ladies and gentlemen, nowadays all nations are striving hard with the impact of globalization in view of improving the lots of their citizens. In building up their manpower, however, countries may defer in their implementation depending on their development and the prevailing stability situation. As most of the developing nations, like that of mine, are coping with their development challenges, being in an emergency situation, therefore the emergency cases have to be recognized accordingly and accept them as exceptional as to the provisions in the Conventions. Otherwise it will be a hasty action for ILO or [vgr INAUDIBLE 2:31] to allege member States for none of their ones of Conventions at its face value, without thoroughly recognizing their genuine eminent force majeure. In case of Eritrea therefore, my delegation kindly requests the ILO to acknowledge the illegal occupation of Eritrean territory by Ethiopia, as actual and genuine force majeure leading to existential national threat. Ladies and gentlemen, basing the principle of self-reliance, focusing on collective national identify, utilizing its committed and realized human capital, and preservation of its natural resources, on its own capacity Eritrea has made a tremendous effort in furnishing the job creation infrastructure in agriculture, mining and marine resources, and other businesses for the fulfilment of Decent Work Agenda. Recently, in 2016 conducted the first ever the labour force survey, funded by UNDP and technical assistance of ILO. The survey results are expected to be utilized for the Decent Work Country Programme formulation which is the key to realizing the sustainable development goals. Ladies and gentlemen, in conclusion, despite some achievements having been produced in human capacity building, further challenges are left to be dealt with. Therefore, within the context of self-reliance Eritrea welcomes the building of any partnership in general, that of ILO in particular through its technical support, to eliminate the root causes and enhance its human and institutional capacity that promotes decent work through integrated measures. I thank you all.

Mr Nihar

Government (Sudan)

Thank you. Director-General of the ILO, ladies, gentlemen, distinguished delegations, I hope that God will accompany you in your efforts. I'm very pleased to participate in the 107th International Labour Conference, and on behalf of the delegation of Sudan, I would like to congratulate you on your election, President, and for the trust placed in you. This session, President, is taking place against the background of major changes throughout the world, and this leads us to re-examine the ILO objectives towards improving decent work conditions, to reduce harassment and violence in the world of work, and to revise certain instruments in order to promote equality for women. And those are the subjects that are contained in the Director-General's report. In Sudan, Director-General, delegations, women have been working in rural areas, in agriculture, for many, many years, and social policies of the Government have been established in order to identify and recognize women's capacities and skills. Measures have been taken to promote training for women and to strengthen their capacities, and that was in 2017, and the Bank of Sudan has offered microcredits that represent 12 per cent of its budget, for rural development. Seventy per cent of these funds are devoted to women. President, we emphasize what has been done to reduce inequalities. Sudan, because of its religion and tradition, does not discriminate whatsoever and seeks to promote women's rights, and it has sought to promote equality as part of its major and micro projects. The report of the Director-General and the five main pillars for equality, mean that savings have to be promoted through enhanced savings. And women should not be exploited and forced to carry out certain activities, and we promote women's participation in the economy. We want women to defend their constitutional rights. We want women to participate fully in the social life, and we have national instruments. We have no complaints of harassment. I would like to pay tribute to the Director-General for the section in his report devoted to Palestinian workers, and I note my concern and wish them success through this 107th ILC. Thank you.

Worker (Nigeria)

... existing strong protocols, established by previous contributors to the ILO Director-General reports to the International Labour Conference. We are excitedly aware that this time next year the ILO will be marking her centenary anniversary. It is for this reason to add to the thrust of the centenary celebration, as captured in the DG's report, that I want to, on behalf of the Nigerian workers, extend our congratulatory greetings in advance to all the social partners, the International Labour Office and the Director-General and his staff for the effort, contribution and sacrifice made over the years to build, improve and manage the global economy, industrial relations and the global discontent with globalization. The ILO has helped the world to effectively recover from two world wars, and given the world a doctrine of decent work as a comprehensive tool to addressing developmental deficits, trigger economic growth and strive towards social justice. Her tripartism governance nature has served industrial democracy and helped to provide some stability to the global industrial relation milieu. Our organization, the Nigerian Labour Congress and Nation Nigeria, share similar anniversary experiences with the ILO. The NLC, a few months ago, celebrated her 40th anniversary of existence, while Nigeria, in 2017, marked her centenary milestone of the amalgamation and the journey to statehood. Our reflection from those two commemorations point to the fact that new challenges are ever within the horizon and manifesting themselves to threaten the gains we have made as a movement and as a nation, and so we must ever remain vigilant and united. First, our advice to the ILO and the International Labour Office is to continue to use her results and outputs as input to effectively take on the new challenges that are confronting the world of work. Some of those new challenges include migration and refugees crisis, automation and technology, artificial intelligence, widening income distribution crisis, workplace and domestic gender-based violence, climate change, and growing insecurity and fragility of states, as well as the failing and falling of democracy and democratic practice. President, we want to once again appreciate the effort of the Director-General for effectively staying the course and cause of this organization, even when the very foundation of the organization were challenged in the Committee of Application of Standards with respect to the right to strike. Workers know that it is ultimately their struggle to eternally defend the right to organize and to collectively bargain and the right to use strike action where inevitable to ensure collective bargaining and the prevalence and enforcement of collective bargaining outcomes. It is to this end that the Nigerian Labour Congress has continued to place premium on building working-class power through organizing and workers' education. Furthermore, President, we have refused to join in the bandwagon of lamentation and the blame game on issues of developmental deficits that many countries, including our country, and the continent face. Rather, we have resorted to imaginative and pragmatic responses. For instance, our organizational platform have been long donated to fight against corruption and good governance, because we want to block financial leakages and improve revenues for public service delivery. We have also joined, and will continue to partner with, our Government at all levels to ensure the security and territorial integrity of our people and communities. It is on this account that we call on the ILO to urgently consider Nigeria to benefit from her Security and Resilience programme. Social dialogue is critical to development. We believe we live in a broken system, where our global wealth distribution is skewed against the 99 per cent of the people. The Global Deal and initiative of our Swedish friends is a pragmatic alternative aimed at helping to fix this broken system. This is why the NLC, in early November this year, will be organizing a continental seminar on the Global Deal to further elucidate on this progressive initiative. President, the rank of the working poor in Nigeria is expanding thus exacerbating households, generational and gender poverty. One of the reasons for this is because the wages are low, depressed and deflated. Given that minimum wage administration had been proven as a time-tested tool to stem wage downward spiral, the NLC is currently, and other tripartite partners, engaging in a minimum wage negotiation with the Government. We remain eternally vigilant to ensure that the process is successfully concluded, within the stipulated timeline, by the Government of the Federal Republic of Nigeria so that this very important issue can be used to address the issue inequality and poverty. Mr President, I thank you for this opportunity.

Ms Nordaas

Government (Norway)

On behalf of the Government of Norway, I would like to express my greetings to the President of the Conference, its officers and to the Director-General of the ILO. The Director-General's report is a good global snapshot of the trends for women in 2018, and it calls for innovative action to close the persistent gender gap. The conclusions are very clear, and if I may say so, not very encouraging. We need to make significant additional efforts if we want to achieve the Agenda for Sustainable Development and its goals on full gender equality. It is striking that women continue to be paid 20 per cent less than men across the world, even when they do the same work, and it is an obstacle that we have a tendency to consider gender equality as a women's issue not of concern to all. Substantial change must involve both men and women. [vgr INTERRUPTION 1:52] Women's participation in the labour market is high in Norway. This is an important factor in the creation of wealth and development in society. Ambitious welfare and family policies have been key elements. Affordable childcare, regulated work hours and parental leave are important reforms, reforms which have had an impact on women's earnings, well-being and bargaining power at home. Social dialogue and sound industrial relations have been key. The Norwegian social partners have played a decisive role in promoting and defining policies to achieve gender equality. In combination with comprehensive income insurance schemes and active labour market policies, it has contributed to a more flexible labour market. Now let me turn to ILO's own performance in-house in the area of gender equality. ILO should lead by example. Gender equality in professional and senior positions needs to be improved by increasing the share of women. This is a management responsibility. Norway contributes 1 per cent of GDP in international development assistance. We appreciate the ILO commitments to mainstream gender into its development cooperation programmes. We recognize that there still is a lot of work to do to improve women's representation, narrow the gender pay gap and empower women. Mr President, Norway can fully support the five areas of action that the Director-General has proposed. There is a mounting awareness of, and calls for urgent action, to address violence and harassment in the world of work. The issue is high on the agenda at the global level, with the recent adoption of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, and we look forward to a substantial outcome on a standard on violence and harassment in the world of work. A world of work without violence and harassment will add force to a new push for gender equality since women are the main victims of this type of abuse. And we are pleased to see the response of the Director-General to the #MeToo campaign. To conclude, Mr President, achieving gender equality is a key responsibility in the mandate of the organization, and it must remain an urgent and central priority in the years to come. I wish the conference every success. Thank you for your attention.

Worker (Brazil)

Ladies and gentlemen, in the name of Brazilian workers and the Trade Union Confederations that represent it, I would like to salute the President and the Chair and the all the delegates, as well as the Brazilian delegates. The Director-General of ILO, Mr Guy Ryder, is defending equal rights for women in the world of work. This is fundamentally important to our Confederation and to our tripartite system which aims to solve world problems. Our work, however, is not restricted to corporate debates. It is important to improve the living conditions of people and promote decent work in all nations of the world. In order to achieve those aims, we must face up to the challenges of the future of work. Some of these challenges are typical of today, so for example, Industry 4.0, the technological revolution and artificial intelligence. Others are more general, such as the exploitation of workers and the respect of human dignity in our country. We are facing a political, economic and ethical crisis. Up to date 13.7 million people are unemployed. There are many people who are underemployed, and there are 7 million people who could be working but they are not. This is a total of over 27 million who are in non-decent conditions in Brazil. This is a higher number than the populations of many countries. The Conventions of the ILO have, for the large part, been ratified by Brazil. However, the Brazilian Government has introduced labour reforms which violate Convention 89, and this is a problem, and this has been brought to the [vgr INAUDIBLE 3:42] at this conference. This even means that women who are pregnant or breastfeeding can actually work in unsanitary conditions. This can affect the health of the future babies. The trade union rights and the representation of workers are also affected. Labour relations have changed and these amendments to the labour law have been carried out without sufficient collective negotiation and without sufficient consultation. In Brazil, we must aim to fight child labour, and we must also fight, in our trade unions, to defend our social dialogue. The Government's actions go against the trade unions, and the ILO also recognizes the fact that trade unions must be strong, and they also must be well structured so that Brazilian workers may not be negatively impacted. President, in the face of so many difficulties in Brazil, we will resist. We will insist on dialogue. We will insist on a revision of the system in place, and we will also insist on tripartism. We want tripartism to be a reality in our country, and we believe that it is a model that applies to our country, and that will be able to promote decent work and greater value granted to work. This will enable us to achieve our aims and we count on the support of the ILO. We also wish the ILO great strength in future. We want its bodies, its committee of experts, who are independent and recognised by the international community, to be strengthened. Thank you.

Worker (Viet Nam)

Mr President, delegates. First of all, on behalf of more than 10 million union members and the trade unions of Viet Nam, I would like to extend to Mr President warmest congratulations on your election to the post of President of the Conference. I fully consent to the agenda an item for discussion of the conference, and believe that the 107th International Labour Conference will achieve great success and adopt meaningful policies to improve working conditions of working men and women. Apart from the report of the Chairperson of the Governing Body, and the report of Director-General on The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality, this conference also discusses other items, including effective ILO development cooperation in support of the Sustainable Development Goals, and standards setting regarding violence and harassment against women and men in work. The Viet Nam trade unions welcome and strongly support this initiative of the ILO to set a new standard, which could be considered a significant landmark towards the centenary of the ILO. Nowadays in Viet Nam, the status of women is being enhanced and recognised in the societies. Viet Nam has a workforce of more than 55 million, of whom women make up among 26.5 million, accounting for 48 per cent of the total workforce. As a result, the policies related to women worker have been further completed and promoted, such as the law on gender equality, labour code, trade union law, law on social insurance and as a legal document. The Vietnamese Government has adopted a number of important strategies, namely the National Strategy on Gender Equality, the National Action Plan on Prevention of Domestic Violence. In the process of making policies directly related to workers in general, and women workers in particular, the Viet Nam General Confederation of Labour has played an effective and active role to recommend and participate with the Government in formulating and adopting the legislation on gender equality, elimination of gender-based discrimination, violence and harassment, as well as a relevant policy that gives more priority to women so as to protect their rights. We also adopted trade union action plan on gender equality in order to realize the National Action Plan on Gender Equality. This action plan of our trade union is also integrated with the organizing of women workers with the aim to improve their capacity and skills, promoting job security and enhancing their status in the family and society. At the same time, this action plan enables awareness raising among trade union representatives, union members and workers about gender equality, making contribution to better protection of women workers' rights and interests. In addition, with the support of the ILO, in May 2015, the code of conduct for all enterprises to combat sexual harassment at work was made public, which was the outcome of the joint efforts of the three social partners in Viet Nam. Mr President, delegates, over the past years, Viet Nam's trade unions have received meaningful cooperation and support from the ILO in general, the ILO Office in the Asia-Pacific region and the ILO Office in Viet Nam in particular. Taking this opportunity, we would like to express our sincere thanks and look forward to continually receiving technical support from the ILO in the coming term, which will enable us to better represent and defend the rights and interests of workers and union members in general, and women workers, women union members in particular. Thank you for your attention.

Mr Ytzhaki

Government (Israel)

Distinguished delegates, thank you for the opportunity to address the ILC in connection with Israel's economy and the future challenges in the world of labour. The Israeli economy has recently been characterized by low unemployment rate, around 4 per cent, and a stable rise in the rate of participation in the labour market. The minimum wage is relatively higher than its fixed statutory rate. General collective agreements are created frequently. In general, there is productive cooperation between the unions and the employers' organizations. An example of this is the general collective agreement made recently concerning the reduction of the work week from 43 hours a week to 42 hours, without any reduction in salary. This is for the purpose of improving productivity and striving to increase the rest and leisure time of the employees. An extension order had done for this agreement which make it applicable to the whole economy. Another method that the three parties are presently dealing with is the matter of safety in the workplace, and particularly in the construction industry. Cases of injuries at work, falls from heights, etc, are unfortunately common. Therefore, incentives have to be given for employees who observe safety within their framework of a collective agreement. On the other hand, there will be stiffer penalties for employers in the industry, within the framework of the Increased Enforcement of Labour Laws law, while simplifying the administrative proceedings against the companies. Significant increase in the number of inspectors has been carried out already. It is important to point out that recently there has been a large increase of the disability allowances paid by the National Insurance Institute. In recent years, we witnessed a long trend of industrial peace. The number of workdays lost due to strikes are very low. Even the issue of decent work has gained a strong foothold. There is a considerable improvement in working conditions, special arrangements for people with disability and efforts to integrate them into the labour market. A significant increase in the minimum wage, about $1,500, and addition of a vacation day, the addition of payment to pension, increased enforcement of working conditions and wages. Also, significantly important is in the working condition of contractual workers. Moreover, there is dialogue and fruitful cooperation between the Government and the social partners. Within the framework of our activity to safeguard working conditions for the foreign workers, special emphasis has recently been placed on the extension of the bilateral agreements for bringing to Israel migrant workers. This method will enable us to overcome the phenomenon of illegal brokerage fees and improve the awareness of their rights. It is known this year marks 20 years since the 1998 Declaration of Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work. In this context, Israel has naturally ratified all eight core Conventions of the ILO. Beyond this we are in the very advanced stage of ratifying the Protocol to Convention 29, which is of great importance in the struggle against various forms of false labour. We thank the DG, Mr Guy Ryder, for his important visit to Israel in last April, together with his delegation, and for a rising matter important for both parties. Thank you.

Ms Agbémégnah

Worker (Switzerland)

Mr President, distinguished delegates, Travail.Suisse and the entire Swiss delegation of workers congratulates the Director-General on his report with respect to the initiative on Women at Work. Against the present background of a labour market which is continuing to evolve and characterized by digitization, it is more than necessary to practise a modern equality policy. Travail.Suisse has drawn up a position paper, Gender Equality Today and Tomorrow, with 28 recommendations aimed at granting more freedom of choice and preserving the quality of life of workers. Equality is not only concerning the fate of women, since it contributes to improving working conditions for all. We note that most of the people who are affected by inequality are women, and that is in the 2030 Agenda and its objectives. We need only mention wage discrimination. In 2016, Switzerland recorded wage gaps of 12 per cent, of which 40 per cent was unexplained and revealed gender-based discrimination. In 2017, wage discrimination was at least 7.7 billion Swiss francs (CHF). Today, the Swiss Parliament is discussing a draft reform of the law on equality, providing that only 0.8 per cent of companies based in Switzerland, corresponding to 45 per cent of employees, be subject to wage verification without any sanctions in case of inequality. These measures do not enable us to fully recognize women's work. Switzerland ratified in 1972 ILO Convention 100 on equality of remuneration, and in 1961 Convention 111 on employment discrimination. So the key principle, equal pay for equal work, does not remain a dead letter. It is time to show political courage and to legislate in order to make this principle obligatory. Equality does not concern just women. According to a study carried out in Switzerland, nine out of ten men would like to work part time. Only 17.5 per cent are able to do so. Moreover, the existence of paternity leave as an instrument for gender equality does not exist yet in Switzerland. That is why Travail.Suisse has launched, along with other associations, an initiative for a 20-day leave. The present law just provides for one to two days, and as a move is not in keeping with the realities of the labour market and family needs. A 20-day leave would be a step forward in promoting equality and a better conciliation between private and professional life, as is advocated in the Director-General's report. Moreover, the Director-General's report notes a new care economy. 35 per cent of the resident population cares for children and adults without being paid. It is necessary for this sector to develop by improving the legal framework conditions and adapting the social insurance schemes. With respect to the ILO's contribution to promoting women at work, the standard setting activities should remain at the heart of the ILO's action. We welcome the standard setting process on violence and harassment in the world of work during this 107th ILC. In order to promote real equality, we have to create laws and provide for sanctions, establish regulatory mechanisms and facilitate negotiations so that equality is part and parcel of an enterprise's policy. We need also to support and guide efforts that favour equality. President, Director-General, ladies and gentlemen delegates, on the eve of the ILO centenary, that Switzerland will have the honour to preside over next year, the question of the future is crucial, especially through the initiative on the Future of Work. If I could be slightly poetic but still realistic, I would quote Jean Ferrat who sang, "La femme est l'avenir de l'homme," woman is the future of man. In other words, social justice, including all, is the only safeguard for mankind's progress.

Mr Abreu

Worker (Dominican Republic)

I wish to salute you, all workers, in the name of the workers of the Dominican Republic. I am representing them here at the 107th Conference of the ILO. It is a historic conference on the eve of its 100th birthday, and I wish to greet you on behalf of the Workers' Confederation of the Dominican Republic. We, as the Confederation, have decided to submit the following cases to the ILO for the violation of the international Conventions 87 and 98. We are going to present complaints for these violations. The following companies are concerned. Minera Pueblo Viejo Barrick Gold, Menzies Aviation, Peravia Motors and Longport Aviation have violated these Conventions of the ILO, and the Independent Confederation of Workers has also submitted a complaint against the electricity company Edenorte. These companies are violating the freedom of association despite the fact that international Conventions 87 and 98 have been ratified on freedom of association and collective bargaining. We were able, before filing these charges here, to pursue other routes in our country. However, the administrative authorities were very timid and the legal and justice systems in the country were inefficient, and that is why we had to file our charges here at the ILO. For five years now, in the Dominican Republic there have been discussions concerning a reform of the labour laws. This was proposed by the business sector, called for by the Government, and the trade unions movement have agreed to assist it on the basis of the following principles. We want that the need for change in processes in administration be guaranteed, and also, we cannot accept, as trade unions, that a reform should mean that the contractual interests and economic interests of workers be affected, especially in terms of their rights, even if these changes are hypothetical as in the case of severance. The fact of the matter here is that we submitted amendments to our system for the social security system in our country. The system in our country requires changes. It must be more inclusive for healthcare, for labour risks, occupational risks, and there is also a provisional system in place in our country which does not guarantee sufficient protection for workers. Dominican legislators in the country have opened up a debate on this matter, and we shall participate in this dialogue. There will be one dialogue concerning the labour code and another concerning amendments to the social security code. These will take place at the national congress. [vgr INTERRUPTION 7:09] It is fundamental that the rights of workers be protected. [vgr INTERRUPTION 7:26] Let me repeat that it is fundamental that the three confederations of trade unions in the country have made complaints and these refer to maternity rights. [vgr INTERRUPTION 7:54] The trade unions in the Dominican Republic have decided to follow a specific strategy in order to defend the rights of women, the rights of work for young people, labour rights, social protection for pensioners and the full eradication of child labour. Thank you very much.

Ms Howard

Worker (Barbados)

Mr Chair, fellow delegates, it is my distinct pleasure once again to stand here on behalf of the workers of Barbados. First, let me commend the Director-General for another exceptional report. The issue of creating a level playing field for women in the workforce remains a major issue for many countries especially since the existence of the proverbial glass ceiling has been an obstacle for women for many years. Within Barbados, we've steadily pushed back against this notion that women are not equal, and a cursory look at our landscape shows that we've made significant strides in this respect. Women are found in the most prominent positions within our country. For example, the two largest trade unions are led by women. Our Governor General is a woman, and I am pleased to report that 10 days ago we elected our first female Prime Minister. However, this is just the tip of the iceberg. An evaluation of our public and private sector would reveal that many executive roles are in fact held by women. This is largely due to the availability of free education up to the tertiary level. With this as an achievement, there are still some improvements which need to be made, which include the need to ratify Convention 189 related to domestic workers. This sector predominantly comprises women, and our current portfolio of labour legislation provides limited protection to this vulnerable sector of our workforce. The introduction of this provision and the supporting legislative instruments would be a necessary step towards decent work for the sector. Furthermore, there is a need to implement policies that take into consideration workers with family responsibilities and recognize that largely women are the primary caregivers of small children as well as parents, as is evident in our aging society. These women therefore require assistance to create and maintain the critical family-work-life balance. I cannot speak about women in the world of work and not highlight the issue of violence and harassment. In recent months, the issue of harassment has come into focus and has been the subject of much debate, and we have been witnessing a number of women who have been braving public scrutiny to share their experiences. Unfortunately, harassment is seen as a taboo subject, one which is whispered and not spoken for fear of ridicule. Very often these unacceptable practices are excused and hidden under the guise of being cultural norms, but they must be discouraged through strong and decisive legislation. I was particularly pleased at this apt time that a discussion regarding the introduction of a Convention on harassment and violence in the world of work was placed on the agenda of this 107th sitting. I must register my heartfelt disappointment that an issue which I believe would have had common uniting elements became one that resulted in significant areas of division. While I address the issue of women, I must not fail to reiterate the issue of the youth because they are too are facing some of the challenges cited by women with age as their differentiating factor. In many cases youth are marginalized and encounter issues of inequality. Their challenge is based on lack of experience and limited opportunities to allow them to attain the required skills to progress. It would be remiss of me not to highlight how particularly pleased I am that the social partnership in Barbados is once again being given the prominence which it deserves, and the recognition has been an invaluable tool for consultation and problem-solving. I anticipate that this institution would be viewed as a critical tool, which can propel our country into the future helping to realize many potential benefits of the green economy as well as the digital age. The social partnership should be viewed as a tool for economic growth and development and not merely a response to difficulties being experienced. On the eve of this centenary, I must reiterate that while we continue to encourage and promote the upward mobility of women within the world of work, we must give equal opportunity to the plight of the youth. According to the Director-General, the future is ours to create, and what we do can have a decisive impact on that future. Therefore, we must continue to prepare and continue the important to ensuring that we put things in place to take us another 100 years. I thank you.

Mr Robinson

Worker (Seychelles)

President of the Conference, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, good afternoon. On before of the Seychelles Federation of Workers' Unions, and on my own behalf, I take this opportunity to congratulate the ILO Director-General, Mr Guy Ryder, for giving us this special report. Special because it could not have come at a better of time when the whole world desperately needs to reconcile on an approach to address this consultation on the equality of women and men. Focusing the world of work initiative is timely and indispensable. Needless to say, but worth remembering, the ILO has achieved great strides and is still doing a lot in regards to gender equality in the world of work since its creation in 1919. However, in spite of the divinity of the good intent, nothing could have been done had it not been through social dialogue machinery of tripartism based on an effective social dialogue. This has to remain, as we know it, the ILO DNA. This louder cry for equality for women in the world of work is not merely a cry for justice. It is a universal requirement, if not to say a divine order of the day. For this reason, it should neither be interpreted nor strategized into a simple rational of finding replacement of our depleting workforce worldwide. It calls for a deeper commitment for us men. We should understand that women and men are the two wings on which humanity progresses. Unless they are both strong and beating in harmony, no real progress will be attained in this world. It is very pertinent for the ILO centenary celebration. It is enshrined in the ILO principle for social justice. Seychelles has ratified all eight core Conventions of the ILO, all geared towards decent work for all, for peace and social justice to prevail in the world of work. The Seychelles labour laws make provision for the protection of all workers' right, including women. Women participation are visible in all levels of our society, from political leadership, ministers, Parliament, more and more women are heading towards public, parastatal and private organizations. To commemorate Labour Day 2018, this year, the Seychelles Government has legislated an increase in maternity leave from 14 weeks to 16 weeks and paternity leave from 5 days to 10 days. Seychelles is trying to increase gender equality at all levels of society. We also welcome the report of the ILO on ending violence and harassment in the world of work. This revelation on the hard realities happening to women in our respective countries is no longer acceptable. Mr President, I cannot end my speech without commending the Governing Body of the ILO to include as agenda item a recurrent discussion on the strategic objective and the social dialogue and tripartism as a follow-up to the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization 2008. Social dialogue and tripartism is essential for democracy and good governance. It is widely agreed that the whole business of the ILC would not have been possible without the application of the ILO critically important decent work strategy pillars of the social dialogue and tripartism. No debates ongoing on our agenda items in this conference would have produced a united vision had they not been based on the effective application of the principle of social dialogue and tripartism. I would like at this point to thank the ILO and ACTRAV in the extremely good work they do to assist in empowering our member States and social partners to apply the principle of social dialogue and tripartism. In Seychelles, the Seychelles Federation of Workers' Unions, the Ministry of Labour and social partners live and work in the spirit of fruitful cooperation. As trade unions, we should not merely be satisfied that social dialogue is happening at national level. We should ensure it also happens at all sectors at our workplaces. The ILO has taught us to use the principle of social dialogue as a working strategy to deal with all aspects and challenges at the workplace. It addresses the core concerns of our men and women and youth directly in the workplaces. The Seychelles Federation of Workers' Unions, in its drive to organize workers, has experienced significant results at various workplaces in both the public and private sector because of effective social dialogue and tripartism and bipartism. We have therefore seen an improvement in working conditions for the stevedoring sector and the public transport drivers, amongst others. To conclude, the Seychelles Federation of Workers' Unions joins its voice in solidarity to the extremely difficult situation of our brothers and sisters of the occupied Arab territories. Mr President, I therefore call on all men to commit to the women in the world of work initiative with sincerity and commitment, for if women do not achieve their rightful status, we will not achieve ours as men. I thank you for your attention. May God bless you all.

Mr Mimboui Nguema

Government (Gabon)

Mr Chairman, Director-General, distinguished delegates, in my person, Gabon is honoured to take the floor before this august body on the occasion of the ILC. I would like, before going ahead, to congratulate the Chairperson of the Conference, Mr Chair. With lively interest, we have examined the reports of the Chair of the committee of administration and of the Director-General of the ILO, the convergence of whose views and supremacy according to action go hand in hand with our country's hopes. The celebration of the centenary of the ILO in 2019 will be an important stage in the history of our organization. We share the opinion which has grown up inside our administrative committee last March which, and I quote, says "There's a large place in the initiative for the future of work while leaving margin for other initiatives," which should allow the ILO to face the challenges of the future. On the subject touched on by the Director-General in his report, I'd like to remind you that discrimination, of which women are the object, is a scourge on the world. As mentioned in that report, we note and deplore that the majority of women occupy low-income jobs. In the world of work, this phenomenon should not be attenuated but eradicated. This is a responsibility incumbent on all the constituents of the ILO. As regards the legal question on the agenda, violence and harassment against women and men in the world of work, I appreciate with optimism and serenity how well founded this is and the direct link it has with other Centenary Initiatives. Gabon has reinforced its legal arsenal, not only with the insertion of this concern in the working code but also the adoption of a special law on 5 September. Thus, any employee who is the victim of sexual or moral harassment can sue his employer or directly the staff representative bodies, which do have an alert procedure which allows them to warn and prevent the employer and to take any action it feels appropriate. The authors of the people who engage in harassment incur penal sanctions as well as disciplinary ones. Because of this, any dismissal of staff is [vgr INAUDIBLE 4:10]. Without being exhaustive, these punishments take on all the discriminative measures in matters of pay, training, reclassification, assignment and qualification. The adoption of instruments under discussion will allow us, if necessary, to improve our legislative framework. In Gabon, the President of the Republic has also instituted equal opportunities within his priorities. At another level, the Government has written into its road map the promotion of work and social protection, the switching of jobs from the informal economy to the formal, and the promotion of social dialog and tripartism as the vectors of peace, stability and development. To come to better results, the putting in place of this road map ought to be within a framework of harmonized expertise which is authoritative, promoting work for young people, women and vulnerable groups, improving and broadening social protection, promoting social dialogue and tripartism, because we share the firm conviction that the ILO remains the ideal framework for our concerted action and sustained action to promote decent work. Finally, ILO must see to it that these questions, notably women at work, are taken into account before 2030. Thank you.

Ms Houlmann

International Confederation of Executive Staff

President of the Conference, distinguished delegates, tripartite social dialogue is the subject of the recurrent discussion of this 107th International Labour Conference. In his opening speech, Director-General Guy Ryder, called upon us to identify the obstacles. Here are some of them. Tripartism involves three types of actors. Let's start with the workers. Here in the ILO, we have known, for 100 years, what a worker is, that the relationship of subordination characterizes the worker. And in French, we all know here what a cadre is. In English, we speak of professional staff, executives and managers. These are white-collar workers but also pink or blue workers who have some type of responsibility, know-how, expertise or a team to lead. Managers serve as a bridge between employers and other workers. They are located at an intermediary position in the hierarchy, as they apply the decisions of the employer but also see to it that they are applied. The Confédération Internationale des Cadres, the CIC, created in 1951, is the first confederation representing managers at the international level. It includes apolitical, free and independent unions of executive staff and works towards social justice. We know how to discern limits between workers and employers, between worker, manager colleagues, and higher-ranking employer managers. The Philadelphia Declaration of May 1944 affirms freedom of association amongst its fundamental principles. However, in 2018, in some countries, executive staff cannot join unions. Is it right for countries, so-called advanced countries of America and Europe, to prevent or forbid managers from joining unions? Each worker should have the possibility, freely, to join a union, whatever his status, category, type of contract and nature of his employment relationship. Managers throughout the world should be able to unionize, participate in collective bargaining concerning them, just like all workers. Is it right to leave unions of managers outside of negotiations and exclude them from social dialogue? Is it democratic, for a government or a union of a country to offer unions and an observer's chair at the end of the table, or even worse, to exclude them from collective bargaining? Based on exactly what criteria are they not recognized by their peers? What criteria of representativeness do they not meet? The criteria of representativeness should be the capacity to contribute to social dialogue, the number of members, independence, freedom of expression, free of vested interests or governmental pressure, or the yolk of directors. Mutual recognition means the acceptance of diversity and the admission of all unions of workers meeting commonly accepted criteria. The world of work is evolving, diversifying. It's time to re-examine who may sit at the negotiating table. On the employers' side, it would be good to enrich delegations with all types of enterprises, historical or emerging. Small and medium sized enterprises, very small enterprises which provide most of decent work, contribute their vision of enterprises on a human scale. Enterprises of the social and solidarity economy, cooperatives, these are original models, often socially inventive, and they are innovative principles with added human value or interesting paths for the future. Why are companies reluctant? And finally, governments play a lead role in deciding whether to initiate social dialogue and promote collective bargaining, leading to broad-based consensus. It's good to listen, but reflecting and negotiating together is even better. The CIC advocates collective bargaining at the most appropriate level, respecting standards in all decisions concerning social policies of enterprises and nations. In conclusion, the centenary is a good opportunity to relaunch the role of social partners in the world and in enterprises and to strengthen tripartite social dialogue and revitalize collective negotiations. Alongside those who through social dialogue, are building the future of better, more just work, more decent employment, more respectful of the environment, you will find the CIC, the Confédération Internationale des Cadres. Thank you.

Mr Sahraoui

Trade Union Confederation of Arab Maghreb Workers

Thank you very much. I am speaking here in the name of the Trade Union Confederation of Arab Maghreb Workers. I would like to thank you very much for letting us speak here. I would like to congratulate you on the Director-General's report, which focuses on gender equality and on how to achieve it. We are convinced that it is necessary to fight all forms of discrimination, and this needs to be promoted by international standards. There has to be more coordination between the United Nations organizations as well as other international organizations. In order for countries to achieve such equality, and for there to be a dialogue, it is necessary to communicate. It is necessary to do so, also, in order to fight harassment against women, both within the world of work and outside the world of work. It is necessary to fight discrimination against women, and it is fundamental that elements be set up in order to promote such equality. Ladies and gentlemen, in the world of the Arab Maghreb, there has been great progress in terms of women's right in all areas. Trade unions and employers' unions in the Maghreb have created important spaces in order to mobilize social forces to fight all forms of discrimination, including violence against women. The aim is also to empower women and to create gender equality. I do feel that in the political arena, too, this gender equality must be promoted. I would like to congratulate the President of Tunisia's initiative, because a law has been passed which enables both men and women to enjoy the same rights when it comes to inheritance laws, and I think that this is very inspiring for Arab countries and the Arab Maghreb. As to labour relations, with the support of other organizations and the ILO, we will strengthen programmes that allow us to coordinate with civil society and fight all forms of violence and harassment. The aim is, in part, to strengthen the legal framework in place. I would like to urge the ILO to support the Trade Union Confederation of Arab Maghreb Workers within the framework of advanced training courses. At these courses, we wish to focus on social dialogue amongst the various stakeholders in production. Ladies and gentlemen, the Director-General in his report on the occupied Arab territories has stated that the situation is very serious. The Palestinian people are suffering greatly. We would like to state that the Israeli occupation, the embargos, the colonizations, the settlements and so on are the sources of the degradation of the situation there. We wish to call upon all measures possible, within the framework of international law, to resolve these issues. It is important to avoid double standards, and it is necessary for the Palestinian people to be able to create their own free independent state. I wish you the best of success at this conference. Thank you.

Mr García

World Federation of Teachers' Unions

Mr Director-General, we, the teachers, would like to state and highlight the following. Faced with the current capitalist crisis, and even more so, the devastation in the globalized world, the colleagues of the teaching profession continue firm in the conviction and thought that we, by way of open dialogue and fair bilateralism, will come to a common accord and social peace. I'm going to stress that not everyone is bad, so I ask today for your solidarity, but above all I ask this organization to intervene in our working relation, which should have fruit but a relationship which should bring relationships for the people and from the people. The law and obligations of law are things that have been forgotten. However, today, the workers in the teaching profession are taking part in an integrated development of the profession so that it should be secular, it should be free of charge and obligatory. We must see the imperative necessity of our road, which will bring us to success. The education in the world must be basic, it must be secular, it must be free and obligatory. In America, from North America, by passing through Central America, and finally arriving at South America, so I'll try to stress very firmly and specifically that we must get away from politics and policies which want to privatize education because they are trying to take education away from our children. But we also should think that the problems we are encountering are hidden in neo-liberal politics of corrupt governments who see education as a piece of merchandise. Ladies and gentlemen, my union appeals to the ILO and all delegates here present for equity, justice, unity and the application of class democracy, so that we come to a new era in education and work where tripartism and flexibility generate the necessary conditions for decent work. Today, on 5 June 2018, we say that, in face of the veracious growth of the imperialist in relation to military budgets, while investment in education is always going down. We must have a right to strike that is requested, so that any act of terrorism, any nuclear strike, anything that maintains ignorance. We claim an immediate halt to repression and criminalization of social protest must stop. We declare ourselves against privatization in education. The future of this and other generations depends on all this. It's very simple. Many years ago, Socrates, a great teacher from Athens, saw a truth and thinking about it said, "The only true wisdom is in knowing you know nothing." These are independent words which say a lot. Thank you so much.

Government (Brazil)

Mr Vice-President, the Brazilian Labour Legislation dated back to 1943 and needed to be updated. After a comprehensive discussion in Parliament, the bill entered into force in November last year. It extends legal protection to specific situations of the economy that were previously uncovered. Hiring has been facilitated and formalization encouraged. The legislation increases eight times the amount of the fine directed to the employer who does not register their workers. Enhancing conventions and collective agreements between unions and employers is another key aspect of our modernized legislation. The labour rights enshrined in Article 7 of our Constitution, a robust and unique protection for Brazilian workers are fully preserved. The new legislation has still a way to go in order to placate the unacceptably high unemployment rate left by one of the worst economic crisis in Brazil. But figures of the first quarter of this year show that more than 330,000 jobs were created, a number not seen in Brazil in the last five years. Any matter on the case of Brazil concerning Convention 98 on collective bargaining should be dealt with in the framework and rules of procedure of the Committee of the Application of Standards. Mr Vice-President, Brazil strongly condemns all forms of modern slavery and is fully committed to its eradication. In 2016, the federal union states and municipalities adopted a national pack to eradicate modern day slavery. Over the course of the last decade, Brazil has developed innovative and effective policies and mechanisms to combat forced labour, such as the special group on mobile inspection and [vgr INAUDIBLE 1:35] list. The fight against forced labour receives full support from the Ministry of Labour. In September 2007, an additional 5 million reals (BRL) were made available for labour inspection in the whole country. During the last two years, positive concrete results related to the number of workers rescued from forced labour have been possible. Brazil is party of the main ILO Conventions, including Conventions 29 and 105, as well as the Slavery Convention and the American Convention of Human Rights. I thank you very much, Mr Vice-President.

Government (Slovenia)

Thank you. Distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, the world of work is changing faster than ever. The transformations are mainly driven by rapid technological progress, which continues to profoundly alter the characteristic of the labour markets, as well the nature of work itself. Yet some old issues still preserve. One of them is gender inequality in the world of work which has, in spite of many significant efforts of the international community, proven to be very persistent. Therefore, I am especially pleased that this year's Director-General's report addresses the theme of Women at Work. Women represent half of humanity. That makes them the largest social group that is structurally exposed to discrimination. Moreover, around the world women are still exposed to violence and harassment at home as well as at work. In other words, they are victims of violation of the most basic human rights. This is why Slovenia strongly supports the effort of the International Labour Office as well as the efforts of the distinguished delegates that together bravely decided to address the issue of violence and harassment against women and men in the world of work in a comprehensive way and with the clear aim to develop, adapt an international legal standard that would clearly define violence and harassment in the world of work as unacceptable and illegal behaviour, as well as provide for accessible legal remedies for the victims of such behaviours and acts. Ladies and gentlemen, in many parts of the world, women have no or very limited access to the labour market, which prevents them from being economically independent as well as from fully realizing their potentials, abilities and aspirations. Even in the most economically developed countries the persistent stereotypes and some traditional values continue to hinder full and equal realization of women in the business world.

Up to the present time, women in the so-called first world have been inadequately paid for their work or not paid at all for their home and care work. The latter is still mostly considered to be in the domain of women. Hence, it comes as no surprise that the leadership positions are even now predominantly reserved and accessible to men. Slovenia is already profoundly committed and devoted to the principles and objectives of the Women at Work initiative. The Slovenian Government is aware that hampering women means disempowering half of the population. This is why one of our government priority policies is ensuring the equality and equity of men and women in all areas of life. We are very proud of several achievements. In Slovenia there is a large proportion of women included in the labour market. Women are mostly employed full time. Furthermore, Slovenia is one of the few countries where the employment rate of women with children is even higher than the employment rate of women without children. The latter is the consequence of the very organized and accessible public childcare, existence of favourable arrangements in terms of maternity, paternity and parental leave, providing of morning and afternoon care of children in the lower grades of elementary school. Nevertheless, despite the high employment rate of women, the division of labour in the private sphere remains unbalanced. Women, compared to men, devote twice as much of their time carrying out unpaid, informal housework and care work. But this is not only the issue of the labour market. It is also the issue of the rights from the social security systems that are connected with the labour market. It is also connected to the lifelong learning issue of woman does not participate in the same level as men. The Slovenian Government launched several campaigns and projects on promoting equal sharing of housework and care work between women and men. Additionally, the Government adopted the Resolution of the National Programme for Equal Opportunities for Women and Men for the period 2015-2020. Strategic documents set objectives and measures to achieve gender equality in all spheres of life. To conclude, Slovenia fully and sincerely supports the ILO's endeavours for bettering the legal, social, economic and political position of women all over the world. ILO, with its unique tripartite structure and genuine ability to tackle international issues through social dialogue, from Slovenia's point of view, evidently represents a key platform for addressing and resolving persistent global issues. Thank you.

Mr Mesa García

Government (Cuba)

Thank you, Chair. Delegates, ladies and gentlemen, we believe that the Director-General's report is well focused this year on gender equality in the world of work. It recognizes the advances that have been made, but it gives us a warning that there is still a lot of work to do to gain full equality. We also like the efficiency in the organization of the work of this conference, but we have to bear in mind that the two-week format means that we have to have plenty of time in the run up to the conference so that we can get documents and analyse them, particularly the reports and the speeches given in the opening session. The report talks about violence and sexual harassment at work, and it is generally women who are affected by this, and there is a very interesting consideration of the work-life balance on the one hand and gender equality on the other. This presupposes that all working women should receive social support and benefit for maternity care, but this isn't the case, but 71 per cent of women who are at work do not receive a minimum benefit in this area. We also agree that the working environment cannot be hostile or intimidating for women and any action which is undertaken by the constituents of the ILO should guarantee that we have workplaces without violence or harassment. We applaud the efforts undertaken by the ILO to push equality at work, both in terms of standard setting and through supervisory means and also by collecting data and also by identifying new opportunities. Looking at the initiative to promote a new international standard against violence and harassment at work, we believe that we have to bear in mind that there are different realities in different countries, and that we have to see what the actual situation is. And these are often covered by the instruments of other international organizations, and therefore we have to really analyse the situation in the world of work. Chair, in our country, we can proudly point to achievements that we have in this area, and we can see that Cuban women are much more present in the political and business life of the country, and we can see women involved in all tasks of the nation, particularly in the areas of health, science and education. Be that as it may, we are not happy with what we have achieved, and we are aware that we can achieve more, particularly if we establish new policies and legal standards which protect the role of women, the important role of women in preserving human kind. And it is we men who have an obligation, responsibility to work for that so-common goal. From the point of view of employers we want to see decent work on the basis of national policies which promote sustainable companies with high productivity, where women's entrepreneurial spirit and young women can be brought in and play a role in the economic development of our country. Cuba has also affected the crisis, and it has not escaped its effects, and we have seen this in the lack of civility in the products and services we offer, and also we have problems with external financing because of the embargo which has been imposed on us for more than half a century. We support the ILO in bringing improvements to the harsh reality that women suffer in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. Thank you.

Ms Radišauskiene

Government (Lithuania)

Dear President of the Conference, distinguished delegates, the state emblem of Lithuania is Vytis, an armoured knight on a white horse holding silver sword in his right hand, and it means the ruler who can defend the country. We are all the knights carrying ILO initiative on Women at Work, fighting against violence and harassment at work. ILO indicated women who enter the labour market are now generally highly educated but still have difficult time finding work. When they do, they are generally segregated in poorly paid, insecure, home-based and informal work. So first of all, equal pay for equal value principles should be respected and promoted further in the context of current and future challenges and opportunities. To achieve this we need effective policy measures. The most important one for diminishing gender pay gap is pay transparency, which makes companies acknowledge the extent of its gender pay gap. Aiming to reduce pay and equality, Lithuania strengthened its anti-discrimination legislation. The new labour code foresees the obligation of ensuring equal pay for the same work of equal value. We have established the obligation for the employer to adopt measures for supervision and enforcement of the equal opportunities policies. Furthermore, the employer who has an average number of employees of more than 20 must, upon the request of the work council, provide depersonalized data by occupational group and gender on the average remuneration of employees. Secondly, taking into account the demographic shifts, we have to put more efforts on ensuring decent and paid employment in the care economy. As most of the workers in this sector are women they face major obstacles in this regard. Proper values setting of the care work would bring more improvements to women's working life and attract more men to these occupations. Equally important is for men to pursue careers in nursing as for women in STEM. As regards the digitalization and technological changes, we have to use these changes to reduce the occupational gender segregation. New flexible work arrangements give workers greater freedom on working time. Therefore, policies that can help to balance work and family commitments are essential, while ensuring that all women and men have equal rights to working hours which correspond to their individual needs. On the other hand, not only women but also men need to be protected from long working hours so that they could spend more time with their families and housework. When fulfilling the gender equality, women's participation in the decision making process at all levels also needs to be one of the main priorities. Both women and men must be involved in decision-making process and interest of both genders must be equally represented. Therefore, main priorities of Lithuanian Action Plan on Equal Opportunities for Women and Men are to promote equal employment opportunities, balance of participation in decision-making and promote gender mainstreaming. Several new activities supporting NGO's initiatives on the work-life balance, prevention of sexual harassment, multiple discrimination as well analysis of income gaps, development of good examples of gender impact assessment, training on equality tools in our working place are also foreseen. Coincidentally, Lithuania today is hosting the Women Political Leaders Global Forum, initiated by our president, Mrs Dalia Grybauskaitė and co-hosted by Lithuanian Parliament in cooperation with the Council of Women World Leaders. The forum is called 'It's about time! 100 reasons to act', and it highlights of importance of women's empowerment and potential in all around the world. Dear delegates, this year, in the eve of ILO's centenary, Lithuania celebrates 100 years of independence and 100 years of voting rights so we can really say our life can be different. We all have a chance to change everything, and here it is also the time to push towards equality at work together. Thank you.

Worker (Portugal)

Distinguished officers, distinguished delegates to the 107th ILC, I'm very pleased to be able to speak to you today on 6 June 2018, exactly 74 years after an event which changed the history of Europe and the world, the beginning of the long road to freedom and democracy, which started with the landing of allied troops on the beaches of Normandy, D-Day, which was known in history as Operation Overlord. Freedom and democracy have to be conquered again and again every day. It's never a finished product. It's always a dynamic process, permanently being built, so 74 years after thousands of soldiers and civilians fell, it is still necessary to remember all men and women who fell in order to make peace possible. We are living in a time of uncertainty. We constantly see the resurgence of populism and demagogy, praise for fanaticism, terrorism, xenophobia, deepening inequalities, nationalism which we thought had been consigned to the dustbin of history. That is why it is worthwhile continuing persistently to work in the ILO and the United Nations for peace. Working on the principle of compromise and the need for permanent dialogue, be it political, partisan or social, we must increasingly intervene together with all the social partners, inspired by the will of organized civil society and based on welcoming divergence of opinion, and even opinions, objectives and assumptions, but we must achieve agreement and understanding. In its 99 years of existence, we continue to see here in the ILO that it is possible to continue working for harmony and fellowship. It's always worthwhile fighting for peace. Only peace allows for inclusion. Only peace allows us to combat poverty and help those who have been forgotten and abandoned to their fate. Peace is the ally of tolerance and humanism. With peace we can focus our attention and our energy on placing humanity at the centre of our lives. Today, we're discussing the future of work and new forms of work which are emerging, but what if we do not debate the present? What if we don't understand what the future looks like to our young people? What if we're not able to establish compromises to guarantee that all men and women can build happiness through work, allowing them to support themselves in their own lives and for their families, providing the necessarily stability so that they can even set up a family, promoting birth and sustenance of their children, their education and their health? What if we're not capable of guaranteeing active ageing for our parents and grandparents? With generosity and respect we must not abandon them in the last years of their lives. What if we're not able to reconcile our increasingly demanding and stressing professional lives with our family lives in order to dedicate more time to our children and our family? If we're not able to diminish the great inequality we continue to see with disparities in treatment, wages, behaviour, access to political and management positions between men and women, we know that women suffer, often in silence, from the inequality that is their destiny, and this is in addition to the harassment and violence that we have not yet succeeded in eradicating. If we're not able to fight the great precarity that we've seen in recent decades on the labour market, what will happen? We see thousands of young people who are excluded and face instability, and they must face the constant danger of unemployment, and thus emigrate as a result of their disillusionment and despair. If we do not overcome all of these challenges, then how can we discuss the future of work if we're not even able to come to grips with the present? Because I believe in the spirit of social dialogue and compromise, and the ILO personifies this around the world, I would like to express my satisfaction with the social agreement reached on 30 May in my country between the Government and four employers' confederations and UGT Portugal. This is an authentic expression of unity amongst the political and social actors against precarity in favour of promoting collective bargaining. Isn't that the whole point of tripartism and the ILO? On behalf of the Portuguese workers whom I represent at this conference, I can say that we have met our ethical, civic and trade union responsibilities, mobilizing our societies and everyone in our countries every day so that we can build democracy. We know that the road is not easy, but the road is built by walking, and that is what should motivate all of us. Thank you very much.

Mr Lacasa Aso

Employer (Spain)

Thank you, Madam Chair. Ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of my organization, which is the Spanish Employers' Federation, I would like to share with you some thoughts about the initiative that is being taken for Women at Work. In the report that the Director-General submitted to us, which tries to do the groundwork for a number of Centenary Initiatives, it refers to the challenges women face and it sets out a number of solutions so as to surmount gender inequality in the world of work. This is a very laudable effort by the Office, but we believe it's a missed opportunity because it is very subjective, and that is something which you see in certain parts of this text, and also there is no real empirical analysis which backs up the description of the underlying causes of this problem. What we miss here is that the ILO instruments, which are set out in this report, are themselves not subject to evaluation which looks at their actual impact and looks at the impact that they have had in standard setting, institution and national policies. The text doesn't refer either to examples or experiences that the office has been able to use on the basis of the resources that the organization has already dedicated to this subject. We believe that the focus is not the best because all effort is based on defence and promotion of gender balance at work, but only at work. We believe that if we look to what we have done in our own organization in Spain, we have come up with a number of conclusions based on analysis made of this area. We believe that managing equality in a company is strategic in its importance, and it has to be factored in as part of competitiveness. Secondly, many of the situations that we find in companies reflect what happens in its society, and these arise therefore from social factors, cultural, educational factors as well, and these can only be overcome via education, consciousness raising and awareness. Third, it's necessary to come up with a response to the difficult achieving of work-life balance, and this has to be done by a multiple approach. We also believe that it is very complex, and to come up with a single formula to bring in conciliation of and equality that would apply to all companies. Not all are the same and neither do they have the same ability to take up these challenges, and therefore one size will not fit all. We believe that it's up to companies to play a role in achieving equality, but it is vital that all actors work together, the idea being to promote women professionally, and to break the glass ceiling so that we can have gender parity at work. This is a collective effort, and we understand that employer organizations have to make a contribution to promote feminine talent, and they also have to get companies to work towards just that. We're mindful of the leadership that our organization has to play. Our work not only should be limited to writing Recommendations, but we have to really develop initiatives such as the promotional programme, and its main thrust is to help women get access to managerial posts. Also to promote education so that we can give greater entrepreneurial education, and also to give greater visibility to women in business so that women can be truly representatives as that they ought to be. This is an initiative that has been taken, and indeed 436 managers from 260 companies have been involved in this, and we have managed to bring on 45 per cent of the participants. We trust that these contributions will enrich this discussion on this very important initiative of the ILO. Thank you.

Worker (Uruguay)

Madam Director-General, at this 107th ILC, the Uruguayan workers would like to begin by acknowledging the special sensitivity expressed by the Director-General in his report identifying the struggle against violence and harassment of women in the labour market as well as the slow consideration of their rights, fair pay and indeed fair treatment in the labour market. We also note his concern for the problems of labour in the zones occupied by the Israeli State, in territories which belong to the Palestinian Government. We reject this because it does not contribute to regional or world peace. Decent work is not possible in the middle of war and torture of a people. Turning to the first issue, we are all discussing in this conference the Future of Work and how this is related to the unfair order affecting women around the world. Indeed, we have no place for violence and harassment of women as we have no place for slavery or child labour or a lack of freedom to organize, and all of these are related to the concept of decent work. Labour is at the centre of our concerns. It is the glue that is inclusive, democratizing in our societies, and it must not exclude women workers. If we want to incorporate the concept of equality and fairness for women into our work, we must recognize that there is no reason at all to prevent them from exercising their basic human rights, the freedom to organize and collectively bargain. In my country, Uruguay, I am a garment worker, a trade union leader in my sector, a wife, head of a household, a mother, a militant and a citizen, and I exercise my right to determine my wages and working conditions on an equal footing with my fellow workers who are men. I maintain my right to defend my safety and my health and my physical and psychological environment as appropriate at the workplace. This is the result of my activities as a trade union activist in the framework of our labour relations and collective bargaining, which I enforce in my country. These are legitimate and appropriate, in line with the standards of this organization. This is the tools that Uruguayan workers use through our representation in order to carry out our struggle to defend our interests. We exercise trade union actions in the context of the core Conventions of the ILO, all of which have been ratified legally in our country. Nonetheless, we have been unjustly attacked, as has the Government of our country, by conservative and reactionary pressures in this conference, and that was the case as well in previous conferences dating back to 2011. These pressures come from Uruguayan employers and the international employers' organization. In Uruguay, we have certain tools that allow us to defend our rights as women, broadening our representation in the conduct of our trade union business in our trade union centre. We are strengthening our bipartite and tripartite actions to defend decent working conditions. Here there is no place for violence or harassment at the workplace, and this takes place in the framework of labour relations where the primary person responsible for the climate at work is the employer. Thus we are struck, as we work here at the 107th ILC, in the Committee on violence and harassment in the work of work, we are struck by the response and the sensitivity, and indeed to pain, that we see in the Director-General's report reflecting the positions of the employer sectors and many delegations of governments represented here. They are resisting taking a position about the future adoption of a Convention or Recommendation reflecting simultaneously the clear understanding that they understand what is happening in this committee. We welcome the officers of this conference and their constituents and their work in this committee. We encourage the employers to change their negative, negligent and unproductive attitudes. We would make the same demand for those who are working in the Committee on Application of Standards. We must return to production of standards and strengthen the bodies which constitute the supervisory system of the ILO. We need to restore the standard setting system in our region, and thus we emphatically reject what happened with the unfair implementation, without consultation, of labour reform in Brazil by an illegitimate government who nobody voted for, and they question the content of instruments that we demand in the form of the Mercosur Labour Declaration. Finally, we would like to salute all organizations who fight daily for decent work and for more and better democracy. Long live the workers of the world.

Mr Breen

Government (Ireland)

Morning, Chairperson, distinguished guests, delegates. I'm very pleased to be here today to address the plenary of the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. It's a particular source of pride that I do so as Government Minister of a country which is now a full member of the Governing Body. When Ireland was elected to the Governing Body last June, it was the first time since the ILO was born in 1923, so it was an honour for us to have a full seat here. Our term on the Governing Body coincides with the ambitious period in the history of the ILO, as it prepares to mark its centenary year next year. One of Centenary Initiatives is Women at Work initiative is the focus of the Director-General's excellent report to this conference. The ILO's record of achievement regarding its commitment to the cause of gender equality at work and into society was the subject last year of the National University of Ireland's Edward Phelan's lecture. Irishman Edward Phelan is an important figure in the history of the ILO. He played a leading role in the 1919 Paris Peace Conference, became Director-General of the organization in 1941, and is widely recognised as the architect of the ILO's unique tripartite structure. On the occasion of the Phelan Lecture, I, together with the Irish Congress of Trade Unions and the Irish Employers Federation, Ibec, had the pleasure of responding to the learned lecture on Women at Work: the Role of the ILO. This was delivered by Professional Mary Daly, President of the Royal Irish Academy. Professor Daly demonstrated that women and work was the core interest of the ILO from its foundation. Yet, as the Director-General points out in his report, almost a century later we're still a long way from the goal of equality. Last year the Irish Government published the National Strategy for Women and Girls, which reflects a number of measures set out in the Programme for Partnership Government to reduce the gender pay gap. This includes the strengthening of the role of the Low Pay Commission, increasing investment in childcare, reviewing gender equality in senior appointments, and promoting wage transparency. Additionally, our legislative programme includes Gender Pay Gap (Wage Transparency) Bill. Ladies and gentlemen, facilitating female participation in employment is an element of the Government's Action Plan for Jobs, which recognizes enhancing female participation in the workforce has the potential to address the growing needs for skill and talent and to deliver significant social gender equality benefits. The Irish Government has performed better than it thought possible since the first Action Plan for Jobs was adopted in 2012 in response to the severe unemployment crisis facing the State at the time. Since then the whole of government focus on restructuring the economy towards expert-led growth has actually proved very successful. The labour market has performed very strongly with over 345,000 people more at work since the first action plan was launched six years before that. And, of course, the unemployment rate has fallen significantly in Ireland from a high of 16 per cent to below 6 per cent now, at 5.9 per cent in April 2018. Ladies and gentlemen, delegates, our Action Plan for Jobs 2018 differs from previous action plans. It is no longer about building a broken economy but more about solidifying progress and ensuring resilience. Brexit, the continued need to realize the potential of our regions, developing our workforce and the ongoing drive to be competitive, to be productive and innovative all combine to inform the actions set out in the 2018 plan. Over the same period, in close consultation with our social partners, we've enhanced employment rights, strengthened our Industrial Relations framework and reformed the State's workplace relations framework. More recently, work has commenced on ratification of the Forced Labour Protocol. These developments, that the Irish Government's are committed to, the Decent Work agenda. It is vital that the Decent Work Agenda informs our thinking on the future of work in this era of unpredicted change. Amidst all the change, one fixed point remains, and I say this sincerely, people are and must remain at the centre of the world of work. Ireland is fully engaged with the ILO's important work in this regard, including hosting a conference in Dublin last year in the context of the Future of Work Centenary Initiative. Continuing the theme of the changing world, I refer to tomorrow's World of Work Summit on the topic of employment and decent work for peace and resilience, which I'm very pleased to say will be addressed by the President of Ireland,

Michael D Higgins. The summit will focus on the central role of employment and decent work in responding to the contemporary crisis situations. Ladies and gentlemen, I will conclude by wishing the tripartite conference participants every success in this important work and what they're doing here at the International Labour Conference is aptly referred to as the international parliament of labour. Thank you very much.

Ms Hajdu

Government (Canada)

Well, first let me begin by thanking the ILC, President, ministers, ambassadors, Director-General and delegates, and I'm happy to speak with you on behalf of the Canadian Government. Canada's proud to be an active member of the International Labour Organization, and our Prime Minister, Justin Trudeau, strongly believes in the importance of engaging in this forum. And one of this year's agenda items, violence and harassment in the world of work, is very important to me, both on a personal level and as Canada's Minister of Employment, Workforce, Development and Labour. I have seen devastating effects of these behaviours first hand, and I've heard the stories of brave individuals who have come forward as part of a global movement against workplace harassment and violence, and these stories have shed light on the magnitude of the problem in Canada and indeed all around the world. As Minister of Employment, Workforce, Development and Labour, part of my mandate is to ensure that federally regulated workplaces, including Canada's Parliament, are free from these intolerable behaviours, and addressing this issue is not only the right thing to do, it is the economically smart thing to do. Allowing workplace harassment and violence to go unaddressed is costly in every way, from the psychological and emotional harms, the physical harms, to the social and economic losses that result. Employees who face harassment and violence often live with high levels of anxiety, of stress, illness and fear, and employers see a reduction in productivity, lower employer commitment, increased absenteeism, higher turnover, legal costs and costs related to sick leave, as well as oftentimes unwanted publicity and a severe impact on brand. The Canadian Government, as part of our broader focus on ensuring the economic success of women, is committed to finding solutions to ending harassment and violence in the workplace, Canada and internationally, and so at home we're acting quickly. We've introduced new legislation to end harassment and violence in our federally regulated workplaces, and this legislation will require employers to prevent incidents, to respond effectively when they do occur and to support victims in their time of need, and the bill is currently going through our legislative process with support from all political parties. We're all committed to getting this right. And Canada is also supporting change around the world. We are taking an active role in current ILO negotiations to develop new international standards that will help protect individuals from workplace harassment and violence, and we're also seeking to include enforceable labour protections in all of our trade agreements. We are promoting a modern trade agenda so that all new and renewed trade agreements include provision on labour, environment and gender. We know that action to protect our workers, our environments, and to promote greater economic empowerment of women is not just the right thing to do, it is the smart thing to do. Provisions that reflect Canada's commitment to fair labour rights is part of all of our ongoing free trade negotiations, and it's a commitment to demonstrating to Canadians that we're expanding our trade with other countries with fair economic success as our primary goal. Legislation, creation of new international labour standards, extending protections through trade agreements, these are all important measures, but we know that they can never be full remedies. For too long employers and managers, indeed all of us, have tolerated workplace harassment and violence, and these behaviours are deeply ingrained in all of our societies. So much so that we don't even notice them. And of course, those with the least power are often the most victimized, and so to change cultures that tolerate this abuse of often the most vulnerable, we must all act. We all have to work tirelessly and together to see change. Governments, employers, organized labour and individuals each are responsible to act with the power that they hold to make this change. We must act collectively to stop tolerating these behaviours, and when we see inappropriate actions in the workplace, we have to speak up. We must support those who have the least power to speak up when they experience these incidents, and when we hear or see something that's wrong, we need to act. And for those of us with power, we must use our power to take action to make our spheres of engagement safe for everyone regardless of gender, age, race or culture. And so I call on all of us to build on that momentum that's been put into motion by those who have been courageous enough to stand up and to say, time's up, no more. We must commit to ensuring that our workplaces are safe and where people, particularly women, can pursue their work free of harassment and free of fear of violence. For many vulnerable people around the world, going to work is a fearful event, and we've got to commit to be allies to those with the least power to protect themselves, and this kind of brave advocacy is the kind of change that's required to ensure better outcomes for all our people, economies and our societies as a whole. I call on you to be part of that essential change. Thank you.

Worker (Poland)

Dear Mr Director-General, the President of the Conference, distinguished delegates, on behalf of the Polish workers' delegation, I would like to first make remarks on the topic of the recurrent discussion of social dialogue. Without tripartite dialogue, no government, no employer and no trade union organization is in a position to develop and improve labour standards. Only tripartite social dialogue, also creation of new regulations based on the principles of decent and safe work, enable all contributors to solving the problems of people covered by the labour protection as well as workers in precarious situations. In this context, I must mention negative Polish development, which stands in opposition to decent work principles. Last month a new type of civil contract in agriculture was introduced to the Polish legal order. It is a contract on aid in harvesting, which introduces a new category of workers as so-called agricultural helper. An agricultural helper is covered neither by the provisions of the labour code nor by the act on minimum wage and is excluded from the scope of health and safety regulations. The result is another precarious category of worker on the Polish labour market, unprotected, underpaid and at risk of pension below basic living cost. Moreover, not all government related measures in Poland in the field of legislation are implemented through full cooperation and tripartite dialogue. Some legal acts are hurriedly dealt with, reaching social partners too late. Trade unions must intervene by demanding compliance with the consultation deadlines. On the other hand, I would like to thank the Director-General for drawing attention to this situation of women in employment. In his report, the Director points out there must be no space at the workplace for violence against and discrimination of women. Generally binding ILO standards are particularly important in this respect.

On the basic goals of the International Labour Conference should be a broad discussion and adoption of the Convention together with a Recommendation that will be entirely devoted to this topic, and here I appeal to all of you to adopt such a solution. So far such a Convention has not been adopted, and there are undoubtedly countries in which women are used in forced labour, are discriminated against in terms of pay, violence and humiliation at work. We should not be passive in the face of such discriminations, hence the ILO's normative activity would be more than welcome in this regard. Finally, I would like to share with you information on one issue very important for the Polish trade union movement. In 2011 my trade union, NSZZ Solidarność, filed a complaint to the Committee on Freedom of Association because in Poland the self-employed and other persons performing work on the basis of civil-law contracts could not join trade union. After seven years, following the Recommendations of the committee to amend the provisions accordingly, this change becomes a fact. All persons engaged in gainful employment, regardless of whether they are covered by the definition on employee, included in the labour code or not, will be able to take advantage of the freedom of association already this year. I would like to thank the Director-General and all of those involved in the development of tripartite dialogue, fair rules of employment and remuneration. May this year's debate serve to improve the fate of working people around the world. Thank you for your attention.

Mr Triaca

Government (Argentina)

Thank you, Madam Chair. In the run up to the centenary of the ILO, we are going to continue our discussion on the Future of Work, and this is indeed one of our priorities as presidency of the G20. We're aware of the importance and the impact that new technology has in each of our sectors, and we want this technological change not to be a threat but to be an opportunity for all where no one is left by the wayside. We need to know what skills will be needed by the jobs of the future, and we are preparing that challenge with the idea of continuous vocational training, and we want to cover various sectors so that we can see whether we have the proper continuous training which will be at one with the needs of labour. This means that we're going to have to come up with more job opportunities, and we're going to have to make companies more productive. As a part of our presidency of the G20, for the first time a group of labour and education have been working together on this, and also the L20 and the B20 groups have been asked to analyse these discussions. We also pay particular attention to gender equality at work. This is one of the fundamentals of the ILO. Indeed, it is one of our basic rights within the ILO. There has been progress made in our country, but nevertheless over the last ten years there has been some stagnation. We don't believe that there is work for men and work for women. We believe this is something that involves all of us, and that is why our country is doing all it can to overcome difficulties of access to work by women. One example of this is a discussion on leave that has been brought to our National Congress and which is going to be dealt with there, and also the quota in trade unions and also pay equality. Also, we are suggesting that we look at the makeup of the different collective agreements, which can distort the role of women in the world of labour. As part of this, we also have our first discussion on violence and harassment at work. Our country expects that we will have an enriching exchange of ideas, and we see this as a priority for our Government. And thanks for the ideas within society and for what women have done to overcome this scourge, we have been able to promote a law on protection of women against harassment and violence. We are also proud of the fact that we were the hosts of the Fourth World Conference on the eradication of child labour, and we have reaffirmed the 96 commitments that we entered into as part of that. And finally, Argentina is in a process of developing social dialogue at the moment, and our President is at the head of that. And in that framework, we now have committees in various sectors, more than 24 sectors in employment, training and innovation, where we're not just looking at standard setting, but we're also looking at the future of work. In the building sector, we've been working in the Vaca Muerta non-conventional energies. In the automotive sector, in the engineering sector, we've been looking at wind energy and renewable energies, and these are some of the areas where we're having real and effective social dialogue. And also, we also have clear negotiations so that we can go from a model of conflict to a model of dialogue. Apart from dialogue we also have a commitment to truth. We have changed our statistics system where there is now public access to information, and these are basic for Argentina. And also, we're against collusive behaviour or gang-like behaviour, and we want to protect the citizens of our country from this. And we believe that there should be no particular privileges and prerogatives according to the Constitution, as is set out in Article 16, and we are working with the justices of our country so that we can really declare war on corruption. No one is above the law, and in a true republic, justice has to act with free hands, and it has to respect the division of powers. The conclusions which are reached here have to be based on tripartite discussion according to the makeup of this organization. In different times, and where world peace looks under threat, we need to use forums such as this so that we can then achieve understanding and tolerance between countries, and this is an approach that Argentina supports to the hilt, a fair and integrated world. Thank you.

Mr Campa Cifrián

Government (Mexico)

Madam President, distinguished representatives of governments and employers' and workers' organizations, members of the tripartite delegation of Mexico, ladies and gentlemen, a warm greeting from the President of Mexico. Today, we are discussing a matter which is enshrined in the Director-General's report on Women at Work: The push for equality. Women in the labour force are placed at a disadvantage. There are flagrant violations of their rights. This slows down economic growth and thus the development of our nations. Around the world women's wages are below those of men. The World Bank in its studies has pointed out that on average women earn between 60 and 75 per cent of the wages that men earn. In addition to the wage gap, we see that women have fewer opportunities to enter the labour market. Gender equality provides a lot of potential for society, and the development of our countries require that we adopt this. We have seen that if women participate in the economy in the same way as men, the world GDP would increase by 2025 by some $28 trillion. There would be an increase of 26 per cent of world GDP. In the near future, the labour market will undergo major transformations because of demographic changes and the so-called revolution 4.0. This is challenge for our nations. Mexico celebrates the importance of this subject in this conference as part of our discussion on the Future of Work. Moreover, in the globalized world that we live in, we must take advantage of the benefits of individual mobility and open markets. There are major opportunities for employment, especially for women and young people. We must face the future with the best possible policies, the most rational policies. The adoption of restrictive practices in trade represents a threat to a whole generation of employment and undermines the potential that women and young people bring to the world of work. In Mexico in recent decades, we've seen greater participation by women in productive activities. Similarly, we have modernized our labour legal framework making Mexico more attractive to investment and creating more decent work for men and women on an equal footing. Our 2012 Labour Law prohibits discrimination due to gender or sexual harassment and the practice to require pregnancy certificates. We recognize the rights of women to take their maternity leave during pregnancy and to reduce their working day when they are still breast-feeding. Also, for the first time we have recognized paternal leave with salary, thus promoting gender equality. In 2015, we issued the new law on non-discrimination and labour equality to consolidate our labour culture and promote the empowerment of women, incorporating gender and non-discrimination in recruitment, selection, mobility and training. We've undertaken actions to prevent violence at work. Of the 3.6 million formal jobs created in Mexico over the last five years, 43 per cent were taken up by women. This is the highest figure we've seen ever since we've recorded these figures. This is exceptionally positive for women where we only have 3.23 per cent unemployment nationally, and we have lowered the rates of informal labour, so we've made positive progress thanks to the joint efforts of workers, employers and the Government. Ladies and gentlemen, the Mexican Government fully agrees with gender equality at work. This is fundamental for sustainable development of nations. We welcome the discussion in the Committee on violence and harassment at the world of work. Finally, we congratulate Mr Ryder for his commitment to making the ILO a violence-free zone and a harassment-free zone. Thank you very much.

Worker (Ukraine)

Madam Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, the Director-General's report over the last two years on the equality for women gives an objective account of the activities of the ILO. We would share the ILO's view that decent work is a general requirement and that political leaders and business circles cannot leave this to one side and any kind of change in national systems of social protection can only be implemented in the direction of improvement, taking account of the resurgence of economic growth. Ukrainian workers also think it's important to continue with the programme of cooperation with the ILO known as Decent Work in Ukraine. The situation, as such, in our country is very worrying. We have this baggage of unsolved problems, which have been piling up for years with the unrelenting military activities in the east of our country. Only through an improvement of national economy and the reinstating of peace will it be possible to meet the many challenges which are before our society. The Government is implementing a plan for reform for 2018, but this requires growth levels in GDP to go up to 3.4 per cent. Some improvement in the economy and in the activation of collective bargaining agreements will have led to an increase in the minimum and real wage levels in the country. However, the minimum pay is still below the poverty line. There's no visible progress, and there's a problem with wage debt, which affects at this time some 100,000 workers. As a result, we're surprised at the ILO decision to close the procedure following the submission by the Ukrainian trade unions on this issue. Over the last three years, we've seen some 4 million people who have been forced out of Ukraine to go work elsewhere because of low wages, and about 600,000 of these are permanently out of the country. The problem of the outflow of workers and the shortage of managers itself is based on the background of the decline of our economy, which has created a slowing-down effect in its development. Low levels of pay for a qualified worker are so low that the ratio between their pay and those of top managers in state companies is 1 to 100. Then there's the question of the gender pay gap, and effective payment of women in Ukraine is about 80 per cent of their male equivalents. Yet, working women are generally better educated, certainly more women have higher education than men do. We have proposed to the Government and employers to introduce a general discussion on pay, overcoming poverty and also dealing with other problems in the country such as rating of work, because work is underrated. Ukraine is the lowest paid country in Europe. Despite all our efforts, we come up against strong policies of the IMF, in particular, who are mainly concerned with getting their loans repaid. In the next four years, we will have to pay back $27 billion to the IMF. This has a negative effect on the talks between ourselves and Government and employers towards new collective bargaining agreements. A number of breaches of trade union law or rights have taken place, and it's becoming more and more difficult for us to produce fair labour dispute settlements. We are losing our buildings, our training centres, despite the fact that we have proof that we are entitled to these, and this is disrupting our activities. We have carried out a number of different protests to the Government and Parliament, and if we don't have any success with this we will have to take our case to the UN High Commission for Human Rights and the European Court of Human Rights. This is not the first time that we've tried to obtain redress from international organizations. Therefore, I'd remind you of the case that we brought before the CAS on ILO Conventions 81 and 129 on labour inspection and the adherence to the legislation in that area. Finally, I'd like to express the hope that the ILO, in the future, will continue to provide technical support to Ukraine to improve our social security situation and do everything to make it possible to get better results in the area of work and to improve the situation for our workers. Thank you.

Ms Robinson

Government (Jamaica)

Mr President, Director-General, distinguished delegates and observers, ladies and gentlemen, good morning. Mr President, I begin by offering you and your Vice-President heartiest congratulations on your elections to preside over the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. As we approach a centenary of this great institution, my Government would again like to pay homage to our Director-General who continues to lead the organization with passion, commitment and purpose. We thank him for his reports. Mr President, while Jamaica continues to seek development cooperation in support of our Sustainable Development Goals, we are proud of the fact that the Government has adopted the right policies and programmes for decent work outcomes. Three years ago, we received technical support from the ILO through a pilot project for formalization of the informal economy to build the capacity of small entrepreneurs to better empower them and embrace the principles of decent work. We continue to work with the ILO with a view to reaping the benefits of that project. In that connection, we are pleased that in the last two years we have seen a significant reduction in the unemployment rate from 12.7 per cent in January 2017 to 9.6 per cent in January 2018 and a reduction in youth unemployment. The poverty rate declined to 17.1 per cent, a reduction of 4.1 percentage points relative to 2015. Reducing child labour also remains a priority, and through the assistance of the ILO Jamaica has received Tier 1 status. Our collaboration with the ILO and the US Government on the Country Level Engagement and Assistance to Reduce Child Labour, the CLEAR Project, will undoubtedly contribute to our achievements in that area. Mr President, Jamaica hails the Director-General for his report on The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality. In support of greater inclusion of women, Jamaica has passed The Employment (Flexible Work Arrangements) Act, which has led to the repeal of the outdated Women (Employment of) Act. We are also advanced in our review of the legislation as regards working time, which incorporates inter alia 24 consecutive hours instead of one day as a rest day for workers, offering greater protection to care workers who are predominantly women. Our women have long been making great strides in the labour market, and there has been an upward trend in that regard, with an increase by 4 percentage points from 54.8 per cent in 2012 to 58.8 per cent in 2016, and this is expected to increase. In addition, according to the Women in Business and Management: Gaining momentum 2015 report, of 108 countries researched Jamaica recorded the highest proportion of women managers at 59.3 per cent. We do recognize that non-standard and precarious forms of employment practices still exist and are continuing to address these practices. Violence and harassment in the workplace is a matter which the Government of Jamaica has taken quite seriously. Parliament is currently considering the passage of the Sexual Harassment Act, which we expect to address one of the most serious and prevalent forms of violence and harassment. We also have high on the legislative agenda an Occupational Safety and Health Bill that identifies violence and harassment at work as a core safety and health issue, and it's also intended to address psychosocial hazards in the workplace. At the centre of it all is the Economic Programme Oversight Committee, EPOC, a multi-partite mechanism anchored in social dialogue and tripartism and which has contributed tremendously to Jamaica's macroeconomic stability. Mr President, on the eve of the centenary celebration of this noble organization, let the true meaning of the Philadelphia Declaration imbue in us a spirit of hope that in the words of Nelson Mandela, "We may become a force of peace, friendship and social progress throughout the world." I thank you.

---

Mr McCoy

Employer (Ireland)

Good morning ladies and gentlemen, colleagues. Ireland remains Europe's fastest growing economy. This impressive performance is testimony to the strength of the Irish business model, a model of substance with depth, diversity and years of tactical planning and implementation behind it. This year job numbers will reach record levels, with over 2.2 million people at work and the economy approaching full employment. However, maintaining this success presents challenges. Firstly, how do we do so without experiencing significant competitiveness erosion and the knock-on impact of this on jobs and living standards? Secondly, how do we do so while positioning the economy to face the challenges posed by rapid technological improvements and fundamental shifts in the nature of work itself? Today, I want to raise three areas where we need to be assertive. Confident policy responses are required, one that addresses the immediate issue and those we will be facing for many years to come. The first is education. Automation, digital platforms and other innovations are causing a growing polarization of labour market opportunities between high and low-skilled jobs, unemployment and underemployment, and risk increasing income inequality. To address these challenges, public policy should focus on investing in individuals' broader employment security rather than maintaining a specific role which will eventually become redundant. Throughout the schooling system, flexibility, resilience and an appetite for learning needs to be much better integrated in what we teach and how we teach it. Curriculum reform and teachers' professional development are critical. The second issue I want to address is job transition. While we need to equip young people with skills to navigate this new world I've described, we also need social security and education systems to provide necessary support at all stages, not least because there will be many stages. People will be changing jobs, they'll be changing courses, much more so than in the past. Smooth transitions between work and between non-working phases in life is going to be a crucial component of both the quality of work and the quality of employment. It is this key determinant in enabling more people, especially women, to participate and remain in the workforce and combine paid work with other responsibilities and activities, and these include looking after families. These transitions will depend on effective public employment and social protection systems, reformed in line with how labour markets are, not as how we wish them to be. They cannot be regarded as services to turn into just at times of economic difficulty. We must turn to these services in much more progressive ways than we have done so in the past. The third point I want to mention is the broader issue of labour market regulation. With longer working lives comes the need for different types of working for different people at different stages and in different circumstances. It is time to rebalance the narrative that flexible hours or part-time working is always poorly paid, undesirable or precarious. Many workers choose to work in sectors for flexible hours are available to achieve this work-life equilibrium. The work-life equilibrium that they both require and desire, and the ability to access flexible forms of work, have created significant opportunities for many workers to take up and to retain an active working life while balancing other responsibilities or ambitions at the same time. Our focus should be on providing well-designed, stable working arrangements that allow for this flexibility, a system that enables employers to respond to the changing business demands whilst also creating the opportunities to build decent work for those who wish to vary their levels of participation in the workforce. In conclusion, the new world of work demands a new approach, an approach that meets the challenges head on, but one that is also tailored to take up the many opportunities that are now present, and we will look to this future as a time when we had the opportunity to make that change now. Business cannot afford to wait around for outcomes of long policy-making processes. In a globally competitive economic environment, there has never been a more urgent time to think about how talented, enterprising workforces and constant innovation in product and service development need to be married together. We need the right labour market policies to support future workplaces that are driven by dynamic science and technology, flexibility in working practices, flexibility to engage and attract talent, which will be crucial to promote economic growth. If these are well-thought-out and designed policies, then we can really look forward to both a great future and sustainable employment. Thank you.

Mr Koolmees

Government (Netherlands)

Thank you. Dear Chair, Director-General of the ILO, social partners, member States, ILO officers, NGOs and other guests, good morning. It's a pleasure to speak here today at an organization that is so valuable to us. The ILO sets the international standards as far as labour and social security are concerned and has done so for almost 100 years. But I have to say, the Dutch Ministry of Social Affairs and Employment is slightly ahead of you, and I guess it will always be so because this year, exactly this year, we are celebrating our 100th anniversary. And I believe that our celebrations will look quite alike as we have similar history as well as shared challenges, both at present and in the future. Our shared past is one of social dialogue. In the Netherlands we value this dialogue enormously. It has become part of the decision-making process in areas where economic and societal interests come together and not necessarily align. It has proven to be a powerful instrument to breach differences in a peaceful manner, and it has brought us many positive things: a joint commitment to employment, the willingness of employers to support vulnerable groups, trade unions that are constructive, even in troubled economic times. Similarly, on a global scale, the ILO has been successful due to its tripartite structure. Indeed, the ILO is the only UN organization that has brought, and continues to bring, governments and social partners together for reaching consensus on issues that matter in the world of work while respecting each others viewpoints. This is a history we should cherish and foster. ILO's tripartite structure contributes to our efforts to create a level playing field in our labour markets and to our continuous fight for decent work. Also, it can help us to reach the Sustainable Development Goals, for example, in relation to child labour. More generally, we can only promote social justice, equality and sustainable development if we combine our efforts. The Netherlands will continue to invest in the ILO, both financially and with our efforts to build bridges between the three ILO constituents. Let's also be mindful of recent successes. In this respect I would like to particularly mention the report of the Director-General of the ILO on gender equality. I wholeheartedly support the central conclusion of the report, yet the road to gender equality is a long one. The ILO must remain committed to achieving equality of opportunity between women and men. Reaching the age of 100 by no means implies that it's time to rest on our laurels. You can only keep up by looking ahead. Looking ahead requires updating our way of working to present standards, both on a national and on a global level. We have to ask ourselves how effective the treaties and recommendations are that we have drawn up in the last 100 years? The Netherlands therefore supports the modernization process initiated by the UN Secretary-General and also more specifically the initiative by the three constituents of the ILO to set up their own committee regarding the modernization of Conventions and Recommendations. The Netherlands is a member of this committee, and we will continue our efforts to support its undertakings. Modernization is especially important now that the world, and not in the least the world of work, is changing so rapidly. The Conventions and Recommendations should keep the protection levels that we have accomplished. It should be more goal oriented. Supervisory system of the ILO should be modern enough to keep constructive track of what is happening in the members of the ILO. We are facing similar questions on a national and on a global scale. How can we better handle future globalization and anticipate on robotization? What will the future of work bring us, and how can we assure that this future will be a bright one? These are questions we need to answer together. Dear Mr Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I will conclude, the ILO can make a tremendous difference in the world by creating a level playing field as far as labour and social security are concerned. Let's commemorate the past while making future plans. I look forward to the ILO's centenary next year and the results of the Global Commission on the Future of Work. Thank you very much.

Mr Carles Rudy

Government (Panama)

Mr Chairman, may I congratulate you on your election and for the excellent work that you're doing in stewarding this congress. I would like to extend my congratulations to the Vice-Presidents of governments, workers and employers, and to Mr Guy Ryder, the Director-General of the International Labour Organization. On behalf of the Ministry of Labour of the Government of Panama, we would like to welcome you all to this 107th meeting of the International Labour Conference. Chair, as we approach the centenary of the ILO, we recognize what has been achieved by this organization, which is responsible for the development and supervision of international labour standards. It was created in 1919 as the only agency of the United Nations which is tripartite in nature as the governments, employers and workers, its constituents, work together in developing its programmes and policies and in the promotion of decent work for all. Be that as it may, we also recognize the challenges that we face, and everyone is aware of those when we face the future of work. Chair, we would like to welcome the Report of the Director-General, the initiative regarding women in work and the push for equality, and this says that women lagging behind affects the full development of countries. In Panama, gender equality is also an unpaid debt, and we have to deal with this, and that is one of the most important undertakings of the government administration including my Ministry. We have noted the challenges that we face in terms of gender parity policies to increase the workforce so that we can work nationally to remove any barriers which cause segregation along gender lines. We are mindful of these concerns, and in recent years, we have now become a leader in the global development agenda, and we are very happy to see that our Deputy President and our Foreign Minister have been chosen as the regional champion for the initiative to achieve gender equality in the Caribbean and the Latin American region. This programme is called EPIC, and we're working with the ILO, UN Women and the OECD on this project. Panama has adopted a law, and we've adopted Agenda 2030 for sustainable development, and the target number five on gender equality has become key in our actions to empower women in all social spheres, in the economy and in politics. Also, the Ministry of Labour and Development is a leader in implementing the equality seal on companies with the support of UNDP and the advice of the ILO. We want to bring in practices which will mean that there is equal treatment and equal opportunities for both sexes. In the month of June next, we will start implementing this project in ten companies. The parity initiative in Panama is of great importance for the country, and it is supported by the Inter-American Development Bank and the International Economic Forum with the leadership of the Vice-President and the Foreign Minister. And there is a public and private platform to reduce the gender gap through promoting actions and policies which will increase the economic participation of women in the labour market based on three pillars. One, we want to have pay equality for same pay for the same work. We want to bring more women into the labour market, and three, we want to promote women to leadership positions. And also, taking into account the many types of discrimination that working women face, the Ministry of Labour has made sure that we will look at labour rights of domestic workers so that they can also come into the social protection system within the country so that we also have information on their activities. It is also emblematic to talk about what has been done regarding paternity leave in Panama because we understand that there are great benefits that come from such paternity leave. It is good for mothers, and it also helps families integrate with a future view of their re-entry into the world of work after leave finishes. We wanted to have sustainable and true results, and therefore we are working with other agencies regarding employment, and we are providing support in these areas. Training in vocational skills... [vgr INTERRUPTION 05:49] We are also looking at how we can bring women into work, and we particularly want to look at the most vulnerable such as people with disabilities. We have a real commitment to the Centenary Initiative... [vgr INTERRUPTION 06:09]

Mr Sánchez Reyez

Government (Peru)

Thank you, Mr President. Ministers, delegates, on behalf of the Government of Peru, I'd like to offer you a warm and respectful greeting. Peru has been a member of the ILO since it was created in 1919 and is currently a regular member and Vice-Chairperson of the Governing Body. Our country respects the core Conventions of the ILO on trade union freedoms and collective bargaining, abolition of forced labour, minimum age, eradication of child labour, equal pay and non-discrimination, amongst others. Similarly, we support the initiative on Women at Work: The push for equality, proposed with a view to the centenary of the ILO. In this context, I'd like to emphasize that, in Peru, we are aware of the inequalities and underlying disadvantages for women at work. Thus, in November 2017, we adopted a law prohibiting pay discrimination between men and women. Its goal is to specify categories, functions and pay levels allowing us to implement the principle of equal pay for work of equal value. In line with what the Director-General of the ILO has said in his report, we wish to go beyond business as usual. Our law says that employers' bodies, be they public or private, must guarantee that their workers have dignified treatment and a workplace climate based on respect and non-discrimination, as well as an authentic work-life balance. Turning to violence and harassment from which women at work suffer, our law says that employers must guarantee prevention and penalties for sexual harassment. Here we have decided to begin an awareness campaign to promote a culture of equality and non-discrimination in the world of work. All of this is part of our ongoing coordinated policy with the Ministry for Women in Vulnerable Populations. Moreover, the Government has submitted to the Congress of the Republic a proposal to ratify Convention 189 of the ILO on domestic workers. The purpose is to make it provide a framework to improve working conditions for these workers, most of whom are women. Turning to another point as part of the initiatives for the centenary, we would like to express the view that we are determined to continue to meet the existing challenges of social justice and sustainability. We shall continue to develop our labour and employment policies based on the needs of people, care for our planet and fairness. I would like to share with you that amongst the priorities we have been promoting, recently we adopted the Sectorial of Strategy for Labour Formalization 2018-2021. That is because informal employment in our country, and in many others, is one of the main problems we have, despite the fact that in the last 12 years it has fallen significantly. Our national goal is to increase by 500,000 formal registered jobs by 2021, which is the bicentennial of Peruvian Independence. As part of our Labour Formalization Policy, we wish to strengthen our labour inspectorate, coordinating this with regional and local governments, and we wish to include active participation of workers and employers. By 2021, we shall substantially increase the number of labour inspectors and regional offices. We shall implement the administrative court for labour supervision in order to guarantee legal certainty and equality under the law. We have proposed legislation to comprehensively regulate labour training schemes in the public sector with a view to improving management and attracting young talent in the Civil Service. The social dialogue and tripartism, as expressed in the ILO as part of the premise for social justice, is such that in Peru we have decided that all reform and labour policy has to be based on dialogue and consultation between workers and employers. Thus, the Government's aim is to strengthen the National Council for Labour and Employment Promotion. We have foreseen a mechanism to revise the system for determining minimum wages, starting in 2007, in order to have an institutionally established wage-setting system. We are very much looking forward to the centenary ILC next year, which is symbolic for this organization. We feel our attention, by way of a priority, must be focused on the Future Work Agenda. We must, through tripartite dialogue, successfully meet the many challenges that the future of work has given rise to. New technologies must be placed at the service of man, increase of productivity, and of course, healthy and sustainable growth. Finally, as part of the ILC, we reiterate our warm greetings to you and would like to let you know that we are fully prepared to work together with you on the seven Centenary Initiatives of the ILO with a view to understanding and responding to the changes in the world of work and in society. Thank you for your attention.

Mr Mecina

Employer (Poland)

Mr Chairman, ladies and gentlemen. This year's session precedes the 100 anniversary of the International Labour Organization, and the reflection and preparation of this important event cannot be avoided. From my perspective, this year there is particular significance as it is also the 100th anniversary of regaining independence of the Republic of Poland, after 124 years of partitions. The 100th anniversary of the Polish State which, at the time of its freedom, become a founding member of the International Labour Organization closely linked its history with this organization. Today, celebrating the 100th anniversary of the Polish State, Poland can display its achievements of almost 30 years of transformation and 14 years of integration with the European Union. Despite the controversy over some political reforms, it is undoubtedly worth recalling the successes that we are achieving in the area of labour and social policy. As a representative of Polish employers, but also a public activist, I would like to warmly congratulate the Director-General on the choice of the issue of tripartite dialogue as the main theme for the discussion in this year's session. Also, I would like to congratulate on the Centenary Initiative Future of Work, which my goal is to prepare the work of labour for the challenges of the future. Ladies and gentlemen, Poland is an example of a country that is supporting efforts related to economic and social reforms, precisely those forms of tripartite dialogue which mechanism was implemented in the 1990s. The Polish Social Dialogue Council is the most important institution of dialogue with many important competencies and a great potential for action in the area of social and economic policy. In accordance with the European social model, Polish social dialogue tries to combine social cohesion with the competitiveness of the Polish economy. It responds to contemporary challenges and consequences of the international crisis. It also works on improving the situation of the Polish labour market, invests in the quality of work, and finally, it fights against poverty. Today, Poland can display many successes in this area, realizing this way the idea of promoting decent work. Ladies and gentlemen, Poland is consistently implementing the model of vocational education reform, bringing the Polish vocational education system closer to good examples of dual education, realized together with employers. High level of activity of the Government of Poland is focused on investments in the area of family policy, and counteracting aging population which has already proved to have negative effects on the labour market. The challenge is to construct family programmes so that they do not limit their professional activity of women and improve the living standards in Poland. Poland is still facing many challenges of improving labour standards and labour law reforms, reforming employment policy, supporting the disabled, and finally, encouraging the development of a senior policy. Ladies and gentlemen, the tripartite dialogue promoted by the ILO is still key mechanism for supporting social reforms which, on the eve of the 100th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, is proof of the importance and effectiveness of this organization in building global progress and decent work. Thank you for your attention.

Government (Japan)

Thank you Chair. Director-General, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, it is a great honour for me to have this opportunity to make a statement on behalf of the Government of Japan at the International Labour Conference. First of all, I would like to share with you the employment situation in Japan. The current employment rate is 2.5 per cent, the job to applications ratio is 1.59 nationally, and in every prefecture the figure exceeds 1.0. In addition, 98 per cent of university graduates found jobs at the time of graduation, making a record high. The flipside of this high level of employment is that many enterprises are facing difficulties in finding the right talent. Endorsing the Director-General's report, the Japanese Government places great importance on women's advancement in the labour market. In order to promote women's advancement in the labour market, it is important to create a favourable workplace environment to make it easier for women to pursue their careers. It is also important for enterprises to support women's advancement. To this end, we have been implementing various measures. For instance, it is estimated that childcare facilities for approximately 523,000 children have been newly prepared from fiscal year 2013 to 2017. We are working on creating more facilities for an additional 320,000 children from fiscal year 2018 to 2020. Furthermore, in 2014, we increased childcare leave benefits for the first six months of leave from 50 per cent to 67 per cent to prior wages. The aim is to enable women to continue working without quitting their jobs while raising children or caring for older family members. Regarding the promotional measures by enterprises, we established a new legislation called the Act on Promotion of Women's Participation and Advancement in the Workplace. It obliges major enterprises with more than 300 employees to analyse the situation in terms of women advancement and to develop action plans. Because of such initiatives, the number of women working has increased by 2.01 million in the last five years, and the percentage of women returning to work after giving birth to their first child has recently grown to more than 50 per cent from the previous 30 to 40 per cent range. In addition, we plan to allocate a part of revenue from a Consumption Tax raise in October 2019 to free early childhood education and childcare services for children aged between three and five. The Japanese population peaked at 128.1 million in 2008 and declined by about 1.4 million over the following nine years. It is projected to fall below 100 million by 2055. As the population in Japan is shrinking, the administration of Prime Minister Shinzō Abe, is trying to build a society where all citizens, including elderly and young people, women and men and persons fighting illness or with disabilities, can play a dynamic role. The greatest challenge to achieving that goal is Work Style Reform. It enables workers to choose more diverse work styles according to their needs, abilities and their circumstances that they face. We are carrying out the reform from the workers' perspective. More specifically, the reform tackles long working hour practices through tightened regulations such as an overtime cap of 720 hours annually and 100 hours per month. Under this reform, overtime should also not exceed 80 hours on average in two months. Those who violate the regulations will face criminal penalties. Currently, non-regular workers make up 37.3 per cent of the workforce, and 68.2 per cent of those workers are women. In 2017, 14.3 per cent of non-regular workers had no choice but to take non-regular jobs. To that end, the government plans to develop provisions that prohibit unfair discriminatory differences in treatment of regular and non-regular workers. Aiming to implement such reforms, we submitted the Work Style Reform Bill to the Diet for deliberations in April. Japan is a leading solution provider in addressing issues including declining birth rate, population aging and shortage of the right talent. In this situation, we positively adopt innovative solutions, such as artificial intelligence, in a wide variety of industrial activities and for people's lives in order to resolve various social problems. We hope that our experiences can be of reference to all of you in addressing your own domestic issues. Through exchanging information and opinions, we would like to work together to realize the dynamic engagement in society of all citizens, including women. Thank you.

Employer (Panama)

Good morning, Chair, and to the conference and to the Director-General of the ILO and all the tripartite delegations here and all who are gathered here. According to the report from the Director-General, we would like to particularly refer to the obstacles in the way of women in the world of work. We recognize the work that the ILO has done to come up with solutions, and this would then bring full development of women, and we want to talk about the good practice that we have adopted in the private sector in Panama to promote Equality at Work. The CoNEP and its Gender Committee has been trying to implement the ILO Conventions, and this has brought together the employers' side so as to promote this. We see this as being something which has to be sustainable, and we recently did a study, and we did a study on women in management of companies. And we wanted to make our society more aware of what has to be done, and we have a number of actions which are in a road map and we want to promote the empowerment of women. And we have a number of objectives, such as the following. We have to know what the current situation is. We have to promote gender equality for women at work. We have to provide information and make people aware of this. We have to identify opportunities so that women can take on leadership roles. We have to know what the entrepreneurial policies are regarding non-discrimination of women, and we also have to look at what work is being done on Gender Equality, and we also have to know which companies would like to work in this area. We believe that we have to bear in mind, and not lose sight of, the contribution of women to the national economy, and we have to bring more women into the world of work. We know that it is our responsibility to do that, and it is also an opportunity so that decision-making can be more inclusive and bring in women, and this is something that concerns all of us in Panama. It is a priority for us, but this is also part of work that we do in public private partnerships, and we believe that the employers' side is an important ally in gender issues. We are also working with the Ministry of Labour, together with our Foreign Ministry. They have made considerable efforts to eradicate child labour and to bring in gender equality. We believe in tripartite social dialogue, and we would make a call that our committee be able to make real advances here for both parties. We believe that we have to do this, and it is a good place to discuss matters of mutual interest. We also have a standing committee that has been set up, and we would want to have an effective social dialogue so that we can guarantee industrial peace and sustainable development, which will bring decent work to the whole country. As employers, we want this to happen, but we believe that it is important that we also have legal certainty as well. We are looking at the laws that have been passed, and these laws have gone through the National Assembly without consultation of the employers' side. This would be against Convention No. 144, which talks about tripartite consultation, and it is important that the private sector also be consulted. We also noted that there has been a concern with the strikes, and this is a practice which is illegal, and therefore our Ministry of Labour has to prevent this. We also have to look at how inspection has to be used to provide evidence in court cases, and sometimes this is against the interests of companies. We will also be able to tell you that we are working with the ILO on a study to promote sustainable companies with the idea that these initiatives are going to have an impact on jobs, and this would also help us to create decent work through an improvement of the general business environment. In this way we can create wealth, and we can also add to development of the company and of decent work. Finally, we want to share with you that we are very honoured to be a part of the Institutional Committee which was coordinated in the 19th Regional Meeting of the Americas of the ILO, which will be held in October of this year in Panama. We would cordially invite all of you to attend. Thank you.

Government (the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia)

Distinguished President, distinguished Director-General, Mr Ryder, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen. Allow me to start by expressing my appreciation to this opportunity to attend the conference organized by the International Labour Organization. As the Minister of Labour and Social Policy of the Republic of Macedonia, together with the social partners and to deliver the address. I am certain that you would agree with me that every worker is happy and satisfied when their work is dignified. That is when their rights and dignity are guaranteed and respected. The provision of dignified work presents a vital aspect for greater performance and stronger motivation for every employee. It does, however, require joint efforts and communication from both the government institutions and the social partners. The exercise of fundamental human rights is required by both international and national legislation related to the labour, primarily with the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights which is incorporated in the Constitution of the Republic of Macedonia. We, as a country, together with the social partners have been working on enhancing the existing working conditions, creating new and improved conditions for decent and dignified work at the same time. The need for decent work arises primarily as a result of the fact that it links the support to the development and productive and competitive enterprises with the most important aspirations of the people such as good income, job security and social protection for them and their families. Better development and social integration prospects, equal opportunity and treatment for women and men and freedom to exercise their problems to become member of the trade unions and to take part in making decisions that affect their lives. Ladies and gentlemen, for the first time, Decent Country Work Programme was signed with the social partners for the period 2010–2013. The next one was signed 2015. It covers the period until 2018. Each individual programme presents a complex document that envisages action to the certain areas that directly influence the provision of decent work, specifically in the field of employment, social protection, working conditions, social dialogue, international labour standards and gender equality. I am glad to say that together with the social partners, and to a large extent, with the support of International Labour Organization, we have success in attaining the goals and activities this far, and I hope that the trends will continue in the future. Allow me to elaborate on one of the priorities in the latest Decent Work Country Programme and the realization thereof. The first one, inclusive development through job creation and sustainable enterprises. The second, effective social dialogue, and the third one, formalization of the informal economy. In view of the set priorities, the National Employment Strategy was adopted. The National Strategy for Formalization of the Informal Economy was adopted. Continuous work was done on strengthening the social dialogue and collective bargaining capacity of the social partners. A functional system for amicable resolution of labour disputes was established. The capacity of Economic Social Council was improved at both national and local level for the purpose of fulfilling their advisory role, and so on. The Government of the Republic of Macedonia is fully committed to enhancing the protection of working rights, beginning in the mind that this is one of the priorities continuing in the programme of the Government. Whilst achieving these priorities, several legal solutions were adopted last year, thus making the step forward in this area. To illustrate the position, I would like to mention the amendments to the Law on Labour Relations which further required the satisfied certain provision and introduced the new ones relating to the importation of workers in case of termination of employment through the business reason. Furthermore, it was made compliant with the revised European Social Chapter in the section of Protection of Young People and adequate amendments to the improved business environment were made. Furthermore, amendments were also made in the law for minimum salary, which in addition, increased per month but also equalized the minimum salary of employees in all sectors. Following the example of the Private Employment Agency Convention, the law of Private Employment Agency was drafted which now regulates both the establishment and functioning of the types of agency in compliance with international standards. The Government of the Republic of Macedonia believes that the issue of safeguarding and improving the health of workers is one of no less importance and has therefore outlined guidelines for action which are set out in the Occupational Safety Health Strategy 2020. The strategy defines the vision, the strategy approaches, the principles and the main goals of the results and priorities and the key challenges. An action plan has also been developed and adopted, envisaging activities aimed to the system of the occupational safety and health management through a wide participatory and consultative process involving all stakeholders. Ladies and gentlemen, at the end of this short address, I assure that we shall not stop at that we have already achieved thus far in terms of improving the condition for decent work but shall continue to work together with the social partners on the segments that directly affect the provision of decent work whilst taking into the consideration the international standards, experiences and findings. Thank you for your attention.

Mr Gangwar

Government (India)

President of the 107th ILC, Director-General ILO, dignitaries on the dais, ladies and gentlemen, namaste. It is a matter of great joy and pride for me to be present at this stage of the 107th International Labour Conference of the ILO. The ILO's agenda this year is not only contemporary but also relevant. This conference will prove to be a milestone in ensuring better life and service conditions for the workers. Discussion on issues such as women's participation in the workplace, social dialogue and tripartism, sustainable development of the workers engaged in the organized and unorganized sectors will contribute to the human dignity throughout the world. In the last four years, under the leadership of Honorary Prime Minister Shri Narendra Modi ji, our Government has taken concerted efforts to promote the development of all the sections of society, and labour has been the centre of this development process. India is one of the fastest growing economies in the world. Through creative reforms in the tax regime, our Government has successfully implemented the GST as part of the indirect tax system. At the same time, Ministry of Labour and Employment is working to rationalize labour laws in line with changing social and economic conditions. In this direction, provisions of more than 40 labour laws are being simplified into four labour codes. These codes aim to ensure minimum wages, universal social security, improving the working environment at the workplace and strengthen industrial relations. India ratified ILO Conventions 138 and 182 concerning child labour last year. To have an impact at the ground level, we have launched the PENCIL Portal which has components that ensure mechanisms for register of complaints, child tracking system and rehabilitation of child labour. Under the Prime Minister Employment Promotion Scheme, the Government of India reimburses 12 per cent of the total Provident Fund given by the employer for new employee. As a result of this, so far 4 million workers have moved to the organized sector from the unorganized sector, and in the coming year, more than 10 million workers would move to the organized sector. Fixed-term employment has reduced labour market rigidity and has made the country's labour force more dynamic in nature. This has also imparted flexibility to the establishment. At the same time, social security cover is being ensured to the workers. In our commitment to social security to women workers, the Government of India has increased the paid maternity leave, under Maternity Benefit Amendment Act, from 12 to 26 weeks. With this initiative, India has become one of those countries in the world that provide maximum maternity benefit. In order to promote entrepreneurship in the country, especially among the youth, women and small enterprises, the Government of India has launched the flagship microfinance scheme MUDRA under which 6,000 billion rupees (INR) have been dispersed in 120 million accounts. Under the scheme, more than 75 per cent of the beneficiaries are women. The Government of India provides INR0.2 million life insurance cover, and INR0.4 million accidental insurance cover to the workers engaged in the unorganized sector. The entire premium under these schemes would be paid by the Government. I am pleased to mention that as on date, 30 million people have been registered under these schemes. Also under the Ayushman Bharat scheme, 100 million families will be provided health-related social security cover. The scheme would provide to each family medical insurance cover of INR0.5 million. We look forward to the outcome of these discussions in the ILC and again congratulate DG Mr Guy Ryder for a successful ILC. Jai Hind, Jai Bharat.

Employer (Jordan)

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, members of the delegations, dear participants, I am delighted, on my behalf and on behalf of the board members of the Jordanian Chamber of Industry and representative of the employers of the Royal Hashemite Kingdom, to participate with you at this 107th Session of the International Labour Conference which is held annually in order to look into the latest social and economic issues on the international stage, as well as looking into the opinions of the participants and the experts with regard to the appropriate recommendations. As you may very well know, the Arab world, and Jordan particularly, are facing huge economic challenges due to the ongoing Syrian refugee crisis and the necessity to provide decent living for the refugees. But despite the size of the international aid, this is only covering small parts of the cost of hosting the refugees. But Jordan, and by the grace of God and its wise leadership, was able to safeguard its safety and stability. It has provided all the necessary facilitations in cooperation with the international programmes organizations in order to train the Syrian refugees and qualify them to enter the labour market and provide the sustainable sources of income to them and their families. The Jordanian Chamber of Commerce as its part as the umbrella for the Jordanian industrial sectors is participating in the setting up of national economic policies and through the persuasion in the Socio-Economic Advisory Council which are working through the public and private partnerships to implement recommendations to foster the business environment and provide for the economic development and the attraction of more investments that would create jobs, and especially in the least affluent parts of the Kingdom and where the preservation of the youth and women is being fostered. This is in order to safeguard decent work through the participation in governance, supporting activities in this regard, and working gradually and regularly on implementing the decent work principles. The Jordanian Chamber of Commerce is coordinating with the ILO and its regional offices through the necessary implementation and facing of the challenges being faced by the Jordanian labour market, helping employers and jobseekers face these challenges through technical and vocational training and education in Jordan. This was also implemented through cooperation with the Jordanian Ministry of Labour through the initiative to develop specific sectors by running four vocational training centres within four determined sectors in order to upgrade the qualifications and enable jobseekers to find further job opportunities. This is also beginning to help our Syrian brothers and sisters to find training scholarships for refugees, and this initiative requires all the support and the systematic possible support that would enable it to continue. Ladies and gentlemen, the ongoing efforts to achieve the principles of decent work and for the socio-economic development can only be achieved through a conducive environment of just and comprehensive peace in the Arab region. Particularly no doubt that the most important question on the international and Arab stage is the Palestinian cause and the City of Jerusalem and the right for the Palestinians to have their own independent State on their lands with Jerusalem as its capital, with the assurances that the Hashemite custodianship of the Holy sites. Therefore, the solidarity and support of the international community is required to achieve this just and comprehensive solution. In conclusion, I would like to thank all the staff of the ILO and the Arab States Regional Office in Beirut for their positive cooperation and ongoing efforts to support Jordan in its efforts to achieve sustainable socio-economic development and the application of the international labour standards. I also wish you and the organizers of this ILC continued progress and success. Thank you for your attention and may the greetings, grace and blessings of God be upon you. Thank you.

Government (Fiji)

Mr President, congratulations on your appointment and the appointments of the Vice-Chairs. The Report of the Director-General highlights four key areas in the work of the ILO and member States now and into the future. Employment, social protection, social dialogue and tripartism, we agree that these are key pillars that not only advance us into the world of work and the future of work but also sustains us in the process. In the second Director-General's report on the Women at Work initiative, we also agree that despite progress in member States there is still more that needs to be done. We need to supplement policy instruments with new and innovative approaches. Business as usual is just not enough anymore. There is heavy focus now on green jobs and green economy with estimates that 24 million new jobs will be created globally by 2030, in 12 years time, but we need appropriate policies in place to support green economies. The transition to green economies is directly linked to climate change. Under Fiji's current presidency of COP23, with the support of the German Government, we are working on accelerating climate action through talanoa or transparent, inclusive and participatory process. We hope to be able to advance this work in the scheme of moving towards green jobs and green economies. Under Fiji's COP23 presidency, ILO has been able to participate in technical groups giving advice on climate change negotiations on just transition and the Decent Work Agenda. We are glad to have been the bridge to link ILO into the climate change discussion and just transition under our COP23 presidency. In Fiji, we have adopted a green growth framework and a 5-year and 20-year national development plan. These provide sustainable development programmes for environment resilience to reduce poverty and enhance economic growth in the face of climate change. In employment creation and sustainability economic growth is key. This year we will enjoy nine years of consecutive economic growth. Last year our unemployment rate had dropped to 4.5 per cent, and this is the lowest recorded in 20 years. We are well ahead of our national development plan target of reducing unemployment to less than 4 per cent. In providing social protection to the most marginalized in society, we have implemented a national minimum wage, and we regularly review this. We have a strong emphasis on social wage to assist our least well off. These include electricity and water rates subsidy, free tuition, free school bus fares, breakfasts for class one students, pensions for the elderly, free medicine and so forth. We endorse the importance of national employment policies highlighted in the Director-General's report. We are committed to fulfilling the Sustainable Development Goals, which are captured in our own national employment policy now in final text. Our policy captures ten key areas including youth employment, green jobs, gender equality and strengthening good faith relations. We remain committed to meeting these deliverables through social dialogue and tripartism. We are finalizing our Decent Work Country Programmes that will focus on sustaining decent work, job creation and a just transition in rural areas, including climate change and strengthening tripartism for sustainable development decent work. The Director-General's report presents some staggering data on the Women at Work initiative and reveals the reality that disparity still persists. This will continue unless we insist on change that is effective, sustainable and time bound. In a world where we are advocating that no one must be left behind, women, however, continue to face the exact opposite. We are discussing this year violence and harassment in the world of work, a topic closely related to women at the workplace. To accelerate action on this, we fully support the formulation of a Convention supported by a Recommendation. In Fiji, labour force participation is 76.4 per cent for males and 37.4 per cent for females, revealing that the participation of women in the workforce is still a challenge. With this in mind we have implemented measures to accelerate equality for women and increase economic participation and empowerment. We have relevant laws in place and a National Gender Policy and a Woman's Plan Of Action that promotes gender equity, equality, social justice and sustainable development. We support the Director-General's report on The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality and call on the ILO and member States to step up action on creating equality, raising more awareness, increased inspections, technical assistance and sharing best practises. We look forward to working with the ILO to push for more visibility and meaningful outcomes in the future of work we want. I thank you, Mr President.

Mr Awuah

Government (Ghana)

Thank you. Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, I wish to start by congratulating you, Mr President, and your Vice-Presidents on your election to the Bureau of the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference and also to thank you for the opportunity to address this gathering. I welcome the Director-General's report entitled The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality, one of the seven initiatives through the ILO will mark its centenary and strategize for the future of the world of work towards the achievement of gender equality. The report has clearly underscored the need to pursue the goal of equality, which admittedly has been slow, and as a result, there is a need to supplement the policy instruments for the promotion of equality and with new and innovative approaches that address the obstacles and suggest how best they can be tackled in a renewed push towards equality. I admit that today's world of work is unfair to women, and there is no reason to expect that the future will more be benevolent to them unless we make a conscious decision to halt this hostility. Many complex factors contribute to making the world of work unfair to women in varying circumstances and this needs to be addressed for progress towards equality. Mr President, in Ghana, women constitute over 50 per cent of the 88 per cent workforce in the informal sector. This gives us a reason to support the call for continuous engagement to eliminate the gender inequalities, and Ghana agrees that the formalization of economic activities which women frequently undertake in conditions of persistent informality and underemployment is paramount. To address this, we are in the process of passing into law that Domestic Workers Regulation to ensure that domestic work conforms to decent work standards. Our country agenda to formalize the informal sector is anchored on identification, digitization and financial inclusion, and this has being championed from the high office of the Vice-President of the Republic. Under our flagship three-tier contributory pension scheme, the informal sector currently continuous to expand with more women rolling onto the third-tier voluntary pension schemes. Mr President, the ability of women to balance their reproductive roles and economic activities continues to attract Government's attention. Through a shared tripartite consensus on the need to do more to achieve greater involvement of women in economic activities, Government's commitment is manifested in its efforts to extend maternity leave from 12 to 14 weeks. Similarly, the bill to address the underrepresentation of women in decision-making and general political and economic landscape that the affirmative action bill seeks to ensure 40 per cent women participation in ministerial and public appointments at all levels. This bill is before Cabinet for its consideration. Mr President, with his appointment as the AU leader for gender and development to implement Africa's comprehensive transformational 50-year plan, Agenda 2063, His Excellency the President Nana Addo Dankwa Akufo-Addo has already aligned his vision for Ghana in the coordinated economic social development policies to develop optimistic, self-confident and prosperous nation, in which mutual trust and economic opportunities exist for all. Mr President, as a champion of promoting socio-economic development of women, girls and gender parity in Africa, there is no doubt that the President leading Ghana's commitment to support the five building blocks for a new push for gender equality is more urgent now than before. We acknowledge that failure or neglect will inevitably condemn us to a future of work with which remains gender unequal, and for this reason Ghana supports the effort being made towards achievement of this task. Mr President, I want to thank you for your attention.

Mr Carvajal Bustamante

Employer (Mexico)

President of the 107th ILC, Mr Guy Ryder, Director-General of the ILO, I would like to offer you a respectful greeting. With the coming centenary, I would like to tell you that CONCAMIN, the Mexican Employers' Organization I am representing at this conference, is also a centenary institution celebrating 100 years of its existence organizing the industrial sector of Mexico and reiterating its principles and objectives, which are in line with those of the ILO, including promoting employment and the formal economy, gender equality and equal opportunities. Our development process has been consolidated thanks to structural reforms achieved in the following sectors: energy, telecommunications, taxation, education, the labour code. These have been supported by the employers' sector and have established economic and social stability in our nation. The presence of lasting and sustainable companies is indispensable as a means of generating employment. We have had 3.6 million jobs created over the last six years. To continue, it is indispensable to have healthy governance which is both representative and efficient. Its function should be characterized by transparency and accountability, honesty and effectiveness. It must consistently eliminate red tape, which affects the creation and operation of our companies and leads to informal labour. The respect for private property, freedom of expression, legal certainty and personal security are some of the principles that must frame positively our institutional actions. Mexico, in fact, has signed the largest number of international trade agreements, which has opened a channel to economic affluence through productive investment and decent work. We are convinced that social dialogue and tripartism, the pillars of this house, have been reflected in various institutions of social security in our country where the structure and administration include a tripartite participation which is egalitarian, harmonious and efficient. Employers are aware that the future of our country must mean sustained growth and productivity in order to provide decent wages, a culture of effort not waste and quality education allowing better incorporation of students and young people into the labour market. Ladies and gentleman, distinguished delegates, 100 years ago the ILO was founded was founded after an act of extreme violence which almost wiped out half the population of Europe, and other violent events have meant bloodshed and violence in many homes around the world. This assembly comes together to study, analyse and discuss a new instrument to help eliminate violence and harassment at work, which affects workers of both sexes. What is important is that this document should be balanced and satisfy and meet the objectives, and it could also lead to the possibility of prosecution to stop violence in all forms everywhere, not only in the world of work but indeed throughout our tormented planet. Director, the year 2019 will be momentous in the life of the ILO. Its initial activities provided guidance to the world of work in light of the impacts of the industrial revolution. Now we are facing Revolution 4.0, technological advancements, artificial intelligence and innovation. We must not see this as a threat to employment. We should see this as a source of potential opportunities. Failure to move forward is a retreat. In order to move forward we must work together to prepare our workers in educational establishments and working with government and employers. This challenge requires courageous decisions, intelligent, assertive, consistent and fair decisions in order to transform the world of work, and we must listen to the ideas that emerge and the projects that are proposed and consider the actions to be taken to achieve our aims. We welcome the upcoming celebration of the centenary of the ILO. Thank you very much.

Ms Teleguario Sincal

Government (Guatemala)

Esteemed president and delegates, before I speak may I, on behalf of my Government and people, thank you for the indications of solidarity and support to my people given the terrible eruption of the Fuego volcano, and I would also like to present my own condolences to the families affected by this natural disaster. I would like to address you at this 107th International Labour Conference, and I extend to you a fraternal greeting of the representatives of the governments, workers and employers. The Guatemalan Government welcomes the Report of the Director-General, The push for equality, and we believe that we also share its ideas and its innovative methods so that the world of labour no longer remain one made up of just men, and it does not force women to adapt to that model. We are a country that after 36 annual years of conflict is still learning from its differences, and we are making a firm stride in the direction of social dialogue. We are mindful of the fact that we still have challenges before us, but we are going to face these with optimism and boldness. We believe that this is the only way to achieve social justice, and we can only do that by eradicating poverty and bringing in decent work. In this connection, we have a national policy on decent work, and this has been brought together in a participative way, bringing in young people, women, the disabled and migrants on four specific approaches: job creation, use of human capital, environment for the development of companies and also moving people from the informal to the formal sector. We have had a good result for young in the country because we have a number of jobs fairs that we have held around the country, and we have managed to find work for more than 27,000 people. In 2017, more than 3,000 grants were awarded for technical training to vulnerable groups, and we have empowered more than 10,000 women regarding their own rights. The Government of Guatemala has also launched a campaign, 'Yes to Convention 189'. We wanted to promote the rights of domestic workers. We also have made an effort with society and private companies, and now we have looked at preventing and eradicating the worst forms of child labour. We have reduced the amount of child labour to 59,000 children, and therefore we are seen as amongst the 23 countries in the world that have made considerable progress in this area according to a report that was done by the Secretary of Labour of the United States of America. Thanks to our labour inspectorate, we have been able to save more than 900 million quetzals (GTQ) and pay that to workers, and we have also given free legal advice to more than 2,500 workers. This has been done in different meetings with workers, and many of them have won their cases thanks to this. Within the Convention 169, we now have a guide for the consultation of indigenous peoples, and this is based on how we can bring people into public institutions. Looking at Convention 175 on part-time work, I would like to say that our Congress has ratified this Convention, and it is now in force, and we are now working hard for its full implementation. I am also pleased to announce that we have established a tripartite committee for freedom of association and labour relations, and this has allowed us to revitalize social dialogue respecting all those involved. And through this responsible tripartite discussion, we have been able to formulate strategies which will inform working conditions of workers in Guatemala, and we have for the first time submitted a tripartite report to the Governing Body of the ILO. We are now working on a tripartite front to mark the centenary of the ILO. President, I would to thank you that I have this opportunity to talk to you, and I said earlier we are mindful of the fact that we still have challenges ahead of us, but nevertheless, working together, workers, employers and governments, we will bring a prosperous Guatemala which is fair and which all Guatemalans will live in decent conditions and enjoy decent work. Thank you.

Worker (India)

Respected chair and distinguished participants, greetings from Bharat. Once again, we have gathered here in high spirits to deliberate over challenges, opportunities and developments in the world of work. With its unique tripartite model, ILO since 1919, you are working with full commitment and sincerity in bringing government, employers and workers together, throughout the world to formulate labour standards towards promoting decent work for all women and men. Now towards the ILO centenary in 2019, we are discussing an effective development cooperation towards such level Sustainable Development Goals where the ILO has proposed a Decent Work Agenda as universal goal to achieve SDGs. Today our world is confronted by serious issues such as inequality, forced displacement, unemployment, climate changes, growing violence and other humanitarian crisis. Due to globalization, many people are living in places other than their place of origin. Rapid economic integration over the last century has led to the development of supply and value chain model which has given birth to informality and global inequality crisis, and which this Fourth Industrial Revolution with its focus on technological development in robotics, artificial intelligence and genetics has brought new challenges to the labour market. Agriculture and rural economy, which engages major workforce in many developing countries, has experienced the decline in wages and productivity. A rise in harassment at workplace, which not only includes physical attack but also includes domestic violence, stalking, threats, harassment, bullying, emotional abuse, intimidation and other forms of conduct has been reported to create anxiety, fear and a climate of distrust in the workplace. A collection of 17 Sustainable Development Goals were set out by the United Nations in 2015. One of the most important difference between Millennium Development Goals and Sustainable Development Goals is that Sustainable Development Goals were drafted with the inputs of civil society through surveys to find priority areas of engagement. Most of the respondents were under 30 years of age, and areas which were ranked highest for engagement were health care, job opportunities and education. It is an agenda of the people, by the people and for the people, and this we believe will ensure its success. Today, there is an urgent need to work three dimensions, economic, social, environmental, including integrated strategies for sustainable enterprises, skill development, social protection, health and social institution. While talking about economic drivers, a large number of countries, including India, have attempted to integrate SDGs with national policies. Here we would like to propose two essential economic drivers to shape Sustainable Development Goals. First, a comprehensive technology policy which can work in a multi-dimensional manner to provide vision for human sustainability instead of noticing short-term benefits of technology. We recommend the appointment of technological commission and an ombudsman to understand the impact of technological changes. Second, while looking at the thrust on employment generation and skill development, we suggest formulation of a national employment policy which can work with a coordinated and concerted vision to not only achieve employment goals but also to reap demographic dividends. Third, to overcome inequality and balance labour income share, there is an urgent need to work on a wage policy which can provide guidance and the criteria of fixing wages, component of wages as well as wage differentials. But at this grass-roots level is still there a need of unity at local governments with peoples' agenda. Therefore it is our responsibility to create awareness in society as well as in youth and align them with our agenda to bring out transformation. It is time for trade unions to identify, plan and implement their roles under each SDG. It is important that we align our organization opportunities with these objectives and clearly work towards fulfilling them. To realize peace in the coming century, it is absolutely essential that we replace the traditional ascendancy of competing national interest with an international community dedicated to the welfare of the whole of humankind on Earth. With this hope and vision, I would like finish my speech and wish everyone to work in greater solidarity than ever towards 2030 Agenda in these next 12 years. Thank you very much.

Government (Romania)

Mr Chair, Mr Director-General, ladies and gentlemen, the Romanian delegation congratulates the Office for the two reports of the Director-General related to the ILO programme implementation for 2016-2017 and The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality. We welcome in particular the emphasis placed on areas of critical importance, seeking to address situations of major concern in a high number of member States and where the organization can make a difference. The 2030 Agenda for sustainable development and its 17 Sustainable Development Goals promise to close the gender gaps, strengthen support for institutions in relation to gender equality and the empowerment of women. It recognizes that the empowerment of all women and girls is crucial for the achievement of all goals and targets in the new global development framework. To reach these ambitious goals, we have to tackle critical challenges and address structural causes of gender inequality such as education with the essential role for the insertion in the labour market. Gender segregation in the labour market - male-dominated industries and occupations generally pay more than professions long dominated by women. Reconciliation of professional, private and family life - the impact of family-related career interruptions influenced by the duration of the interruption is associated with negative consequences for later employment, and at this stage women lose important opportunities to promote, train and continuously update their professional skills. Gender stereotypes, cultural patterns, customs and traditions that directly influence gender role attitudes and both female and male role models in family life - although some national legislations encourage fathers to take paternity and parental leave, the number of those who use this right is very small. Collective mentality continues to give women the quasi-exclusive responsibility for child raising and household maintenance. Insufficient development of childcare services to enable both women and men to fully participate in the labour market. The low labour market flexibility, part-time employment, flexible work schedules, work from home and other innovative measures that promote reconciliation between work, family and private life. We consider that reluctance and low interest in the use of atypical employment contracts is evident especially due to the existence of gender stereotypes. As far as Romania is concerned, we have the smallest pay gap between men and women from the European Union, in accordance with the Eurostat data. At the level of all 28 Member States, women normally earn 16 per cent less than men. In Romania, the difference is of only 5.2 per cent. In the same time, Romania ratified the Istanbul Convention, and as we speak the law related to combating the domestic violence is under debate. In January 2018, Romania decided to transfer the contributions from the employers to the employee, and also in the same time the taxes due by the employee to the State were also reduced. After the first three months, it was obvious that the employees and also the employers have not been affected by this measure, and the deficit to the pension fund has been reduced with 57.4 per cent. To conclude, Mr Chair, Romania is ready to continue to promote the international cooperation and observe the international ILO labour standards, as well as to share its good practices and policies that proved to give an efficient response to current challenges generated by the unprecedented dynamic of deep changes in the world of work. Thank you.

Worker (Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela)

Thank you, President. Congratulations on your election to the presidency of the 107th ILC. The workers of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela feel that the debates taking place at the 107th ILC are extremely important. Here we refer to the contribution of the ILO to development and sustainable development and to fighting violence and harassment against women and also the maintenance of tripartite dialogue. The development of these themes are subjects on which we have been fully in agreement with the Government of Venezuela. We are devoted to dialogue and social development and the fair distribution of wealth, as well as the achievement of decent work which enables us to keep amongst the lowest unemployment figures in Latin America. The Government has adopted measures to improve the social situation of all workers, including 100 per cent retirement pension for Venezuelans who reach retirement age. Nonetheless, as the Government and workers work together, we have run up against a large sector of Venezuelan employers who reject the possibility of sharing the wealth creation or fair distribution. They are organized in a political entity called Fedecámaras. They are responsible for coup d'état, and their presidents lead the demonstrations against democracy and our institutions. They are responsible for the economic warfare, which domestically engenders inflation and planned shortages, and internationally they support restrictive financial measures and the commercial boycott started by the United States empire attacking the sovereignty and independence of our country. Moreover, while our country has achieved an increase in the participation of women in a more active role in society, in the productive activities of our country, education and political participation, these employers boast brazenly that women are less than 1 per cent of their number, and this is not just by chance. Most Venezuelan employers and the transnationals in our country have become, economically speaking, parasites of our oil income. They do not generate exports or exchange currency income. When the revolutionary Government took control of our oil revenues to guarantee fair distribution into programmes for housing, health, education and nutrition, which reached all of our society, then the employers abandoned their companies, and in some cases the country, accusing the Bolivarian revolution of creating an economic straightjacket. The abandoned companies are occupied by workers, and they start up production again. This occupation does not mean expropriation. It only guarantees continuity and the maintenance of jobs. In our country we have an in-depth social dialogue. It goes far beyond traditional tripartism. The employers in Fedecámaras have refused the invitations of our Government, and irresponsibly they accuse our Government of lack of dialogue, and they invoke Article 26 of the ILO Constitution to ask for a committee of inquiry. Our delegation, who are members of the Socialist Bolivarian Centre of Venezuela, is comprised of more than 3 million workers, and we rely on collective bargaining conventions in both the public and private sector. We believe that the ILO must prepare for the celebration of the centenary with an in-depth review of its mission and vision in a world where we are seeing more and more unpredictable upheavals, where big capital is not guaranteeing decent work. Seventy-five per cent precarious employment worldwide is a shocking figure, and we should be worried about that. In Venezuela, we are committed to the prosperity of our nation and the quest for the highest possible level of social welfare. This is only possible with the commitment of workers and those employers who are authentically prepared to produce a healthy exporting economy which generates foreign exchange and guarantees fair distribution of wealth. We hope that with the contribution of one and all, and especially the governments, the seven Centenary Initiatives and the 17 Sustainable Development Goals for 2030, and in particular objective 8, decent working time for the future, will all be achieved, thus guaranteeing the legitimate rights of workers around the world. Finally, from our humble position, we would like to reiterate our ongoing demand for the right to work, to education and to a country of the Palestinian people. Thank you.

Mr Petersen

Government (Brazil)

Mr Vice-President, you Mr Vice-President have asked the plenary to use parliamentary language. Workers from different countries, who do not know what is going on in Brazil, are passing judgements on the issues that do not concern them. We wish that this kind of behaviour and non-parliamentary language could stop. We're calling you, Mr Vice-President, and the other Vice-Presidents of this conference and the Director-General of this organization to put a stop to this kind of manifestation that is not in accordance with the best parliamentary practices of ILO and of any UN agency for that matter. Brazil does not acknowledge any misrepresentation of legitimate processes in Brazil. Over the last two decades, Brazil has faced political crisis and economic recession. We have implemented important economic and labour reforms, enacted key legislation and promoted positive change. Democracy is alive. Civil society is vibrant. Political debate is in full force. The rule of law is in place and strong, and the judiciary remains fully independent. Our institutions have proven their strength. By our deeds and our actions, the Government has demonstrated its unwavering commitment to the rule of law and above all to the open and democratic character of our society. Mr Vice-President, our labour legislation dated back to 1943. It needed to be updated. After comprehensive discussion at Parliament, the new legislation entered into force in November last year. It extends legal protection to specific situations of the economy that were previously uncovered, facilitates hiring and encourages formalization. Enhancing conventions and collective agreements between unions and employers is another key aspect of our modernized legislation. The labour rights enshrined in Article 7 of our Constitution, a robust and unique protection for Brazilian workers, are fully preserved. The new legislation has still a way to go in order to placate the unacceptably high unemployment rate left by one of the worst economic crises in Brazil, but figures for the first quarter of this year show that more than 330,000 jobs are created, a number not seen in Brazil in the last five years. I thank you very much, Mr Vice-President.

Employer (Peru)

Thank you, and good afternoon, and a warm welcome from the International Conference of Private Enterprise, which is the organization representing our sector in Peru. We agree that gender equality is a fundamental tool for equality in the world. Bringing together the public and private sector, it has an important role. Enterprises have shown that in this area the use of well-designed incentives is more effective than imposing new obligations from a purely legal perspective. Our Constitution guarantees the rights of all individuals to equality before the law, and there cannot be discrimination on the basis of gender, language, religion or any other character. The labour legislation reflects the principle of equality of opportunity without discrimination. However, there are still shortcomings that need to be resolved. In CONFIEP, our organization, we are promoting initiatives for gender equality. Since 2005, we have been technical secretariat of the global compact and promoting the eradication of any form of discrimination in employment since 2007. Through the enterprise association for education, we have been promoting access to primary education of quality for boys and girls around hundreds of schools in the country. Since 2015, as part of the promotion of the 17 SDGs, we have been promoting SDG 5, relating to gender equality as a fundamental element to achieve development. Furthermore, we have been promoting amongst our members to implement gender equality policies to ensure equality of opportunity. More than 64 per cent of our workers in CONFIEP are women. Eighty per cent of management is female, and the first president is also a woman. This clearly reflects our commitment to the promotion of gender equality. We have been continually promoting improved standards for equality of opportunity and are joined by hundreds of organizations. We welcome this contribution. However, we also recognize we are facing a huge task. The tools to achieve our objectives need to be many in number and not just of a regulatory nature. We need to pool our efforts with all organizations involved here, while avoiding duplication and excess of standards and over-regulation. In light of what is included in the report and what has been said here at this conference, we believe that it is necessary to bear in mind each country's particular situation, allowing each of them to choose their path towards equality of opportunity and gender equality for women. We do not need more regulation. We need to strike a balance between the protection of workers' rights, the development of the country and formal enterprises, and in doing so create more employment with decent work and social protection. That cannot be possible without effective labour regulation. Keeping rigid legislation will mean that there is still a huge divide between the informal and formal economy, and that is to nobody's benefit. According to the Inter-

American Development Bank, Peruvian enterprises are subject to some of the most burdensome legislation in the world, which restricts competitiveness, reduces their performance and hampers development. Around 73 per cent of economic activity in Peru is informal, and therefore it is necessary for legislation to create the conditions that will allow a transition towards the formal economy. Formalization is a challenge which our states need to confront and solve. If this is to be successful, then the benefits for informal enterprises need to be clear as they transition to the formal economy. We need to take decisions based on consensus. Recommendation 204 of the ILO recognizes that in order to reduce the informal economy, circumstances at the national level need to be taken into account, and that will be of benefit in the implementation of wide ranging strategies. It is only in this way that we can generate decent work which is well paid for workers. It is only in this way that we can change the difficult the national reality, which has a situation where seven out of ten workers are having to work in the shadows of the informal economy. The world of work is closely linked to investment, and that comes from private enterprise to a large extent. Private enterprise represents 80 per cent of total investment in Peru, so there is no other mechanism to generate formal employment. There is no other formula, no other approach. We need policies that generate a favourable environment for investment and enterprise which is sustainable. Thank you very much.

Mr Alibeigi

Worker (Islamic Republic of Iran)

In the name of God, respectable Board of Directors, senior representatives of worker groups, employers and governments. Holding the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference is an opportunity to protect the future of the worker against the destructive waves of global crisis through the mutual assistance and clear cut expert review and assessment. I hope the outcomes of this conference could yield promotion of the women roles and job security in the world of work for workers throughout the world. Ladies and gentlemen, the theme selected for the report of the Director-General, The Women at Work initiative, at this juncture is very suitable and timely, because women as a half of the population in each country can play an effective role in dynamism and progress of their own communities. Now in the world a great number of women, shoulder by shoulder with men, are working in different sections and domains. However, gender equality is one of the issues which has not been fully achieved yet. Women of the world have not attained occupational promotions and managerial positions, as compared with men, and partly receive lower wages. Of course, it should be noted the employment of the women is mostly accompanied by fulfilling responsibilities. Moreover, in the event of the similar job between a man and woman, due to housekeeping duties, the stress resulting from the work occur in the women more than men do. There are only bitter samples which come from the achievement of the world in the area of decent work, in particular for women is low, as compared with the effort already made. Most of the Conventions emphasize observing their rights, but as long as the decent work condition is unfavourable, the practicality of the Conventions related to the Women at Work initiative will be difficult. Fortunately, the Islamic Republic of Iran has prepared the suitable educational grounds for women, whose outcome is the graduation of the half of the student in the scientific centres, out of the women, that these females graduate with high academics degree are ready to arrive into the labour market. Unfortunately, the tyrannical sanction imposed, and lack of loyalty to the joint comprehensive plan of the action, has caused an annihilation of investment opportunity, and following debt, the destruction of job opportunity for women, and has made the conditions for the vast and active presence in labour market difficult and hard. Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, what today suffers the workers of the world and my home country, and is considered to be one of the most important and basic concerns for workers in the lack of the job security in the work environment. Unfortunately, the prevalence of temporary labour contracts has endangered the job security of workers, and for this very reason tranquillity has been denied of workers and their households. With these conditions, the possibility of planning and using a decent life far from anxiety has been taken away from them. I would like to inform that the temporary labour contract not only has targeted the dignity of labour force, but also they have denied freedom of trade unions too. I would like to request the ILO Director-General adopt a policy for a further protection of these workers so that the governments would also put the redevelopment of temporary labour contract in the jobs with the continuous nature in their agenda. This will assist with taking a greater step to establish transparency for the labour contracts between workers and employers. Lastly, I hope that peace and tranquillity could prevail in the whole world and all humans, regardless of colour, race and nationality could enjoy equal rights. Thank you for your kind attention.

Mr Pavic

Government (Croatia)

Thank you very much. Dear Chair, dear delegates, we welcome the Director's Report. We find it to be well rounded in analysis of the position of women in the world of work. I would like to state that Croatia remains firmly committed to the global increasing of the labour market participation of women and to curbing the gender pay gap. Regarding ILO standards, I would like to highlight that we have ratified Convention 100 on equal remuneration and Convention 111 concerning discrimination in respect of employment and occupation. The ILO has been a key organization for the promotion of the position of women in the world of work, and I believe it will keep its drive in the future. I find the issue of women on the labour market is two-folded. Firstly, in context of lack of labour supply and negative demographic trends we face in Europe, raising female labour market participation constitutes both a key potential and labour challenge ahead of us, as women far from the labour market require a tailored approach and measures. Labour market participation of women is still significantly lower than men, and the gender employment gap stands at around 11 per cent in the EU, and in Croatia it's 10 per cent. As data suggests, this is a significant pool of labour potential we need to tap into. Reasons for the lower activity of women include the lack of opportunities, especially in rural areas, lack of child care and institutional care for the dependent members of their families, and general lack of both individual support and tailored programmes aimed at activation of women who have faced long-term exclusion from the labour market. We would like to highlight one of the flagship projects from Croatia called 'Wish', which is worth €150 million, that we have developed in Ministry of Labour and Pension System, in order to target women at disadvantage on labour market. Within the project, each beneficiary provides care for four households and receives a salary for two years. But also each beneficiary woman gets around €1,000 as a scheme for education and learning new skills. Through this project we aim to activate more than 7,000 women at disadvantage of labour market and provide care for almost 40,000 dependent households. Regarding the provision of available and affordable childcare, which we find very important in life-work balance, we aim to invest €40 million in the extension of working hours of Croatian kindergartens, so the parents won't have to make difficult choice between employment and childcare. Secondly, women in employment face the issue of lower pay and a different speed of career progression, due to gender pay gap in Croatia is around 10 per cent, which is below EU average of 16 per cent. The reason for this is a well developed legal framework. Our Labour Code precisely defines the equality of pay between men and women. Regardless, we will continue to invest efforts to curb the gender pay gap. The share of the household workload is in many cases unfairly distributed. Apart from extending the provisions of childcare that I have mentioned, that we are forcing, we should provide flexible arrangements that will allow women to combine work with their private life. Furthermore, we should promote the utilization of parental leave among both parents. In this sense, I would like to highlight Convention 156 of workers with family responsibilities that Croatia has ratified. Regarding differentiation between female and male professions, we will fight such stereotypes, and we will distribute 17,000 STEM scholarships, through which we will aim to open an opportunity for both for women and men to enter jobs in the STEM field. Following the work of the ILO against violence and harassment in the workplace, Croatia has recently ratified the Council of Europe Convention on preventing and combating violence against women and domestic violence. We consider violence and harassment to be unacceptable, and this includes the workplace. We will welcome a Convention of this issue, supplemented by a Recommendation. As Croatia is currently presiding over the Council of Europe, and on the eve of the centenary of ILO and our Presidency over the Council of the European Union in 2020, Croatia will strive to strengthen the position of women in the world of work. We are sure that the empowerment of woman and a higher share of participation at all levels will provide substantial benefit to us all. Thank you very much.

Worker (Romania)

Ladies and gentlemen, I would like firstly to state that I am honoured to be here at this session of the International Labour Conference, and I would like to thank you for the opportunity to speak here on behalf of the Romanian trade union movement. We welcome the Director-General's report on gender equality in the labour market. This is one of the seven initiatives which the ILO has launched to celebrate its first century of existence, and Romania is one of the founding members of the ILO. The trade union movement in Romania is still committed to achieving full gender equality and stresses the need to remove the salary gap between men women as well as discrimination at work. We also advocate for work-life balance so that the living conditions and the experience of women at work can be significantly improved. We have a new law on trade union activity in Romania, which was adopted in 2011, and this brings in a new flexible mechanism for labour relations, and it has had negative consequences for our labour market and for social dialogue. A number of measures have been done away with and representativeness criteria have been introduced, and the result is that no collective agreements have been concluded since 2011. At the same time, in enterprises we increasingly see a trend towards agreements to be made between workers within those single enterprises. Last year, very few agreements were reached, and this is very concerning. In many cases, these agreements simply took up the terms of the law, so the rate of approving agreements has reduced significantly since that legislative change. In order to form a trade union now in Romania, 15 workers have to be present within a single enterprise. If there are fewer than that, even if they have the same profession or they are spread different companies, they cannot form a trade union, and this is obviously a significant restriction on freedom of association. There is also a lack of interest on behalf of the Government in encouraging true and efficient social dialogue. There have also been a number of changes relating to transfers of social security benefits. Funding for the social security system by workers alone is a unique case in Europe now. Romania is the only country where that is the case. A number of tax changes have been brought in relating to social security benefits, and these have been negative as well. ILO Convention 102 relates to a number of these obligations and there have been a number of negative developments in Romania in that regard. Another area which we'd like to stress in relation to violence against women and domestic violence is as follows. If we look at the laws that we have in place in Romania, a number of problems arise. We know that violence against women has a number of negative consequences and is very costly. The indirect costs of this are also significant; loss in productivity and absence from work, for instance. According to the last report, the European Institute for Gender Equality stated that €10 billion a year are spent by Romania as a result of this. This is 6 per cent of the GDP according to another European report. In conclusion, without true bipartite and tripartite social dialogue, we won't be able to remedy these problems. We need to resolve this situation in Romania, and we look to the support of the ILO. Thank you very much.

Employer (Chile)

Madame President, Guy Ryder, Director-General of the ILO, delegates. For the Confederation of Production and Commerce in Chile, it is a real pleasure to participate at the 107th International Labour Conference, in the home of social dialogue and tripartism. I would like to take this opportunity to extend a warm welcome to the government and worker representatives of our country. In March this year, we initiated a new mandate of Government, with President Sebastián Piñera, and this led to the proposal of new public policies and legislation. We very much hope that these legislative initiatives will promote recovery, growth, investment and employment, and we very much would make ourselves available to make any contribution that can help the country reach these objectives. In terms of work and employment, the Government has designed an ambitious proposal, with the objectives of improving the quality and relevance of training, improving the employability of women, young people and older adults, and improved pensions. All of these are important issues, and they require us to reassess public policies, and in some cases adopt new legal standards. The Report of the Director-General this year relates to the initiative of Women at Work, and promotes equality. Now this is one of the seven Centenary Initiatives of the ILO and is of fundamental importance. In our country, the Government has a broad gender agenda, which promotes gender equality and which seeks to do away with discriminatory regulations against women. For example, those which make it more difficult for them to work because of issues such as childcare, so the Government is seeking to prove access to issues such as childcare. We are aware that society has changed, and only by improved integration of women in formal employment can we promote comprehensive and sustained development in our country. We also note the international debate which has taken place in the ILO, which reminds us that we have not yet reached the future of the work that we desire. And it is fundamental that labour standards, education and schools, and training, adapt to the changes that are taking place in the world and help the extraordinarily dynamic enterprises in the world today. We very much hope that the legislative changes driven by the Government will take this reality into account so that both men and women can, in accordance with their own situations, retrain where necessary and adapt to the new skills that labour markets require. This is a view which is shared at the international level, and many different areas of organizations are looking into this. Lifelong training is here to stay. It is necessary to adapt to these changes, to not be obsolete, not be left behind, and it is a challenge for the whole country of Chile, which requires the efforts of all workers, employers and the Government. Integrating more women into the formal economy is a great opportunity for Chile, and we very much hope that the new Government will come up with proposals that take into account the changing world of employment, the automatization of some tasks, and the increasing importance of adapting training to the needs of enterprises. That is why we are ready to help the Government in this task, cooperating where we can to adapt to adapt these issues to the needs of enterprise. Thank you.

Ms Ilveskivi

Worker (Finland)

Madame President, Mr Director-General, delegates, thank you very much for the opportunity to express the Finnish trade unions' position on Director-General Guy Ryder's report on The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality. We fully agree with and support the aim of the report to promote gender equality at work and in society. Equality between men and women is guaranteed as a human right by several human rights conventions at the global and at the regional level, including ILO standards and other initiatives. As stated in the Report of the Director-General, somewhat progress has taken place, but much more is to be done to reach the goal. Welfare state, which has been built, together with government and social partners, can be considered as the project of gender equality. Universal social rights, benefits and services, including parental leaves which are compensated, childcare and care of elderly people, among others, have provided opportunities for women to participate in working life. Moreover, the right for everyone to education, from early childhood education and primary school to higher education, without being prevented by economic hardship has guaranteed capacities for women as well. Even though Finland has been part of Nordic welfare states, and we have a long history of women's involvement in working life and in society, many problems remain and new ones are emerging. During the last three years, backwards steps have been taken as the consequence of austerity measures of the Finnish Government. Social security benefits and services have been cut, and even children's subjective right to early childhood education has been limited, subject to their parents' participation in working life. This complicates, for example, the return of unemployed parents to the labour market. Despite long tradition of women's role in working life, more promotive measures are to be taken before gender equality will be achieved. Women's share of working in low-paid occupations, fixed-term employment contracts and part-time work is higher when compared with men. Moreover, even though men are taking part to family affairs and care of children more than they used to, these responsibilities lie mostly still on women's shoulders. If gender equality in the world of work is taken globally seriously, childcare and other care services are to be provided equally for all. Director-General raises violence and harassment of women to the spotlight in his report. This is an issue of utmost importance. Violence and harassment take many forms, ranging from forms of maltreatment and discrimination that are hard to prove, to more serious armed and other assaults on the lives and health of workers. Anyone may fall victim to violence and harassment at work. Finnish trade union confederations point out that efforts to develop more detailed legislation preventing violence and harassment instituting appropriate means of protection, aftercare and reporting, and ensuring due process for victims, have failed time and again in Finland due to opposition from employers and with the Government lacking the political will to enact such instruments in Finnish legislation. To be able to reach the goal of gender equality and the right to physical and psychological self-determination for all, we need to be more ambitious in building trust and functioning tripartite cooperation at the national level and at the global level. We must bear in mind that fundamental principles and rights at work, guaranteed by ILO Conventions, as universal human rights are to be respected and enforced without any limitation or derogation. Finnish trade union confederations believe that a new international convention on violence and harassment will be an important measure to finally develop legislation to protect workers from violence and harassment and to promote gender equality in the world of work. It would also promote the global adoption of principles of the ILO Decent Work Agenda in society in general. Thank you very much.

Government (Portugal)

Director-General, delegates, in particular from the community of Portuguese speaking countries. I would like to begin by bringing my greetings to this 107th International Labour Conference, which is the global home of tripartism, and everybody that is here to participate in it. I applaud in particular the Director-General's report on Women at Work. The Centenary Initiative reflects the ILO's longstanding tradition of defending equality. It is a worthy contribution to the Decent Work Agenda, and it brings even greater value to the ILO centenary. Of all types of inequality, few have such an impact as gender inequality: unequal pay, unequal access to high level positions and unequal ability to reconcile work and family. In spite of progress that has been made, these types of inequality persist and call into question the values of social justice and equal opportunities, which are key pillars of our societies. Often they go hand in hand with discrimination. For instance, that discrimination which in the 1950s, 60 years ago, the ILO termed the worst and most violent type of discrimination against women, namely harassment. Despite progress, the persistence of these phenomena and the oppression of women call for greater steps to be taken to eradicate them. And that is why Portugal is pleased to announce that in 2017 it approved a new law with significant forward steps. We approved that law by a majority and with no votes against, following intense work among all the different political forces in the country. We strengthened the right to compensation for victims. We created new mechanisms to protect witnesses and complainants. We increased disciplinary measures in companies, and the employers became responsible for compensating those falling victim to illnesses caused by harassment. There is no room for discrimination in the future of work, and we have a number of other new laws in Portugal based on this. We need permanent social dialogue, not just relating to gender and equality, but relating to all aspects of decent work. This is what we need for our labour market. Social dialogue and tripartism, those founding principles of the ILO, are the cornerstones of a world of work which is rapidly changing. They are the best mechanisms for economic development and social progress. That is why Portuguese labour policies look towards lasting and fruitful social dialogue between workers, employers and governments. Less than a week ago, we agreed a new tripartite agreement in Portugal, which was espoused by the majority of the social partners in the standing committee for consultation, with dozens of new measures. This was adopted by the Government and it has already been submitted to the Parliament for debate. We have improved a number of different aspects of the labour market; bigger penalties for companies with a very high labour turnover, for instance, incentives towards permanent contracts, and a number of other measures. This was the outcome of a very wide-ranging discussion that lasted more than a year, and it is a sign of stability and predictability that we are aiming for all stakeholders in the labour market. But above all, it is a very significant sign, both internally and externally, of the dynamism of collective bargaining and the fight against segmentation and precarity on the labour market that brings together all different members of Portuguese society to improve employment in Portugal. By encouraging the principles of Decent Work, and building a future of work in which we can look towards the achievement of the 2030 Agenda, we are meeting our commitment, this meaningful commitment between governments, workers and employers which is translated into action. And that depends on ongoing dialogue to defend working conditions, decent working conditions, equality between men and women, and full involvement of a number of different stakeholders in the labour market. And it also depends on our ability to reaffirm the value of collective bargaining between workers and employers, and tripartite dialogue, including governments, as fundamental principles in the world of work, and our ability to adapt to these realities in our countries. Thank you.

Worker (Afghanistan)

Distinguished Chair, esteemed colleagues, ladies and gentlemen, good afternoon. It is a great honour to have the opportunity of speaking on behalf of the National Union of Afghanistan's Workers and Employees, NUAWE, a democratic workers' organization in Afghanistan with 174,000 members in 28 offices in 34 provinces. Participation in the Supreme Labour Council for disputes resolution and the Pension Commission of the Social Organization and Private Sector, Labour Law Review Commission, Minimum Wage Commission and the ILO Decent Work Country Programme. Tripartite level legislation, consultation and the drafting of 12 articles on the work and employment with the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs Chamber of Commerce. For many years, NUAWE acquired properties and provide with all legal documents. These properties were bought from the membership fee and function as offices and training centres for the union, and some of them rented, and the rental fee collected and allocated for development project of the union. However, on 27 March 2016, Presidential Order was issued by the Ministry of Finance in the Afghanistan Land Authority to seize the NUAWE properties. On 31 January 2018, Government issued a letter to NUAWE mentioning a possible takeover of its property. In addition, the Ministry of Justice threatened not to renew the licence registration of NUAWE if they are not handing over the properties to Government. This decree and order were clearly against law and justice and the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan. In pursuant the President decree, armed police and military were deployed and confiscated the NUAWE premises on 8 April and 21 April 2018. The police once again raided the NUAWE headquarters by tanks and sealed the offices on 14 of May. They protect the union premises, some of the NUAWE leaders, including its president, a few women were beaten by the police, injured and taken the hospital. Then members also engage in non-violent resistance, including hunger strike. The NUAWE has filed a court case to seek protection under guarantees enshrined in the country's Constitution. However, the Government has so far ignored the court proceedings and continued its anti-union actions. In this conference, the NUAWE is officially nominated as the workers' delegate. However, no support, including financial supported, provided to the Government. The Government has violated and ignored its responsibility and not fulfil its obligation under the ILO Constitution Article 13. We condemn the action taken by the Afghanistan Government to destroy the labour movement, which is very vital for the working people in Afghanistan. We request the House to support Afghan workers to fight for social justice, human and workers' rights, better living and working conditions of Afghans. We strongly urge the Afghanistan Government to recognize the unions as a social partner and respect their fundamental rights, including the union's property rights. We call on the Government to stop the intimidation and use of armed forces, which constitute a serious violation of Afghanistan obligation to respect fundamental workers' rights as a member of the International Labour Organization. The ILO high level mission to Afghanistan should take place as soon as possible to settle the issue of recognition of a free trade union movement in Afghanistan, reissuance of legal licence of NUAWE, operation of bank account and collection of membership fee and return the properties confiscated by the State. I end, by conveying you the sincerest wishes and greetings of our workers. Thank you.

Government (Cabo Verde)

Good afternoon, everybody. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I bring the greetings of the Government of Cabo Verde to the authorities of this 107th International Labour Conference and to all the distinguished participants and delegates. In order to contribute to the topics that have been presented in the reports for discussion at this conference, and to make good use of our time, we would like to express our satisfaction at the Women at Work initiative, which is key if we are to achieve the Sustainable Development Goals which have been taken as commitments by all nations. We have come to the time where we really need to work to eliminate inequalities and guarantee that women have equal opportunities and have the best possible opportunities, those that exist for men. Along the lines of the excellent strategy that has been outlined by the ILO to achieve greater equality, and bearing in mind the path towards a new care economy, Cabo Verde has already set up a new and ambitious programme. To this end, last year, our Government approved a new national care plan, confirming our alignment with ILO Recommendation 202 on Social Protection Floors. This new care system is a holistic one, in that it recognizes the rights of dependent persons to care and also offers opportunities for employment for women, who are traditionally the main care givers. This ... [vgr INTERRUPTION 2:45] Among the commitments which have been taken on by the Government, we have an increase in the national minimum wage from 11,000 escudos (PTE) to 13,000 PTE, and the aim is to reach 15,000 PTE by the end of the legislature without jeopardising macro-economic balance and the country's competitiveness. We have also implemented an unemployment benefit which covers workers in the compulsory social welfare system with a minimum of 60 days and a maximum of 150 days to compensate for loss of earnings due to involuntary unemployment. We are also revising our law on compulsory insurance against occupational accidents and work-related diseases to bring it in line with the new realities and needs of the country. My Government aims to achieve a high quality and flexible labour market which defends workers' rights. We hope to achieve a policy on pay which is in line with social realities and the economy of our islands, and which is compatible with decent work and high levels of fulfilment for our citizens. We are also looking towards a reform of the national education system, because we feel that the future of work for our country depends on education which looks towards employability and in which qualifications in new technologies and training in new types of organization of work have a pivotal role to play. In conclusion, we would like to assure this august assembly that we intend to continue striving to make Cabo Verde a developed, modern, inclusive and open country of the world. Thank you very much.

Government (Pakistan)

Vice-President, Excellencies, social partners, and ladies and gentlemen. We congratulate Ambassador Saja Majali as the new President of the Conference and commend the Honourable Minister of Labour of Jordan for successfully presiding over the proceedings. Pakistan welcomes the comprehensive agenda of the conference which deals with the important dimensions of the world of work. Mr Vice-President, Pakistan is the sixth most populous country in the world with a population of over 200million. Sixty-two per cent of our population is in the working age. Half of that potential workforce, around 62 million, are women. Our Government is cognisant that increasing women's participation in gainful employment could accelerate Pakistan's GDP growth by 3 per cent per annum. For these reasons, we welcome the Director-General's report on the push for equality, and fully support the Women at Work initiative. We welcome the standard setting item at this ILC dedicated to curtailing harassment and violence at the workplace. Women are disproportionately affected by these heinous practices. Mr Vice-President, we view unemployment as a major hurdle in realizing the SDGs and urge the ILO to step up its programmes for assisting Pakistan, as well as other developing countries, in employment generation, particularly for young women. Economically successful women employees and entrepreneurs act as catalysts for social change in developing countries and serve as role models. Pakistan has recently taken important steps to incentivize entrepreneurship, train the labour force in demand-driven skills and generate youth employment, especially for women and girls. These initiatives are bearing fruit. For women empowerment, we are focusing on access to material resources such as land, money, credit and income, availability of decent employment opportunities that involve good working conditions, access to power through representation in political decision making bodies, freedom to make choices in life, enjoyment of basic rights granted in the Constitution and international agreements, equal access to quality education, health facilities and access to various other facilities. Pakistan is committed to meeting the SDGs and Goal 5. Pakistan is also a signatory of the UN Convention for the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women. The Government has internalized the SDGs as national goals through the seven pillars of Vision 2025. Pakistan has also taken concrete steps to foster inclusion, social dialogue and tripartism in policy formulation and implementation. The Federal Tripartite Consultative Commission is instrumental in meaningful exchange of views on all policy responses and key issues. Mr Vice-President, Pakistan appreciates the work of the Committee on Application of Standards in ensuring implementation of the labour Conventions. We are committed to working closely with the ILO supervisory mechanisms to ensure promotion and protection of labour rights across Pakistan. We also consider discussions on effective development cooperation as significant and look forward to the conclusions. In relation to the work on the Committee on harassment and violence in the world of work, we wish to refer to our domestic achievements. Pakistan is pursuing affirmative action to enhance women's participation. Some provinces of Pakistan have even reserved up to 33 per cent quotas for women. The Protection of Harassment of Women at the Workplace Act of 2010 remains fully implemented all over Pakistan. A code of conduct has been displayed in all government departments and inquiry committees have been constituted. Offices of the Ombudsman for Harassment have been established at national and provincial levels. Mr Vice-President, we continue to express deep concern over the violation of human rights of people living under occupation everywhere or anywhere in the world. The impunity with which the occupiers violate intentional human rights and humanitarian law, and in doing so severely undermine the economically viability and decent work conditions of the workers, remains a matter of great concern to us. We also deplore that limitations on decent work, including access to workplace in safety and security, and are being employed as a tool to suppress the people's right to self-determination. I thank you, Mr Vice-President.

Ms Whyte

Government (Costa Rica)

President of the Conference, Ministers, delegates, it is a pleasure for me to be able to give this statement in representing the Minister of Labour and Social Securities, Steven Núñez Rímola, and the President of the Republic, Carlos Alvarado Quesada, who was also Labour Minister and spoke to this assembly two years ago. Costa Rica welcomes the Report of the Director-General, The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality, and the ILO has rightly taken this initiative with a determination to allow tripartite constituents to participate in specific actions to bring equal opportunity into practice. And it is particularly timely to analyse the status of women in the workplace as we commemorate the centenary of this organization and embark towards the Agenda for Sustainable Development for 2030 which sets out the goal to leave no one behind in pursuing development. President, as we build a more inclusive society, Costa Rica has found great strength in dialogue. We have built great progress in developing institutional and legal progress in work. One significant step forward was the approval of the Labour Process Reform Act, which after the Labour Code from 1943 has been the most significant labour legislation in our history. We believe that this strengthens the regulatory framework and combats discrimination at work, also broadens the recognition of the grounds of discrimination to better combat them, such as age, ethnic origin, sex, religion, race, sexual orientation, civil status, political opinion, social origin, disabilities, trade union membership, other forms of affiliation or nationality, along with many other forms which are subject to discrimination. Discrimination is now subjected to significant penalties. At the same time, we are making progress in preventing infringement of labour law by strengthening the national Labour Inspectorate, taking an approach based on decent work and prioritizing actions against infringement, particularly with regard to quality of employment and the workers' well-being. We have also produced inspector guides with a gender focus to enhance gender protection and focus on the different treatments that men and women in the workplace are subject to. We welcome the great progress that has been made. We are working on improving inclusiveness of social security, particularly focusing on social groups that have historically been excluded. From last year, we have had a new approach to domestic workers, based on a significant reduction in the minimal contribution base, and also allowing the possibility for insurance by various models. We are also working to establish health security for such workers, which will benefit not only Costa Rican workers but also foreign workers. This particularly applies to workers for the coffee harvest. We are also addressing many other complex issues on the basis of tripartite dialogue, including the Government, trade unions and business. Consultations are currently taking place in the country on the basis of Recommendation 204 of the ILO on the transition from the informal economy to the formal economy. Costa Rica is a real pioneer in this field. Last March, the tripartite partners reached a consensus on the signing of the comprehensive strategy for transition to the formal economy in Costa Rica, which sets out to facilitate the transition of workers and business from the informal economy to the formal economy. Vice-President, allow me to close by reaffirming our commitment to social justice, equality, development and the wellbeing of all, men and women, with the full and valuable support of the ILO. Thank you very much.

Mr Saraiva

Employer (Portugal)

Good afternoon President, delegates, and particularly the Portuguese delegation. I would like firstly, President, on behalf of the Portuguese employers, to wish you every success in discharging your functions. The agenda for this session covers three significant topics: the Women at World initiative, the drive for equality, in line with the Director-General's report; violence and harassment against women and men at work; and social dialogue and tripartism. The Director-General's report recalls, in light of the asymmetrical and painstaking way in which gender inequalities are disappearing, that certain systemic and structural hurdles are still difficult to overcome. The report states that these obstacles are the most resistant to the many formal legislative and institutional measures to promote equal treatment that have been introduced over the past half century or more, and it also tells us that there is good reason to suppose that simply persisting with the approaches of past decades, despite the real progress that they have generated, will not be sufficient. There is a need to shine a spotlight on those often hidden barriers and apply innovative approaches to overcome them. The Portuguese employers espouse that point of view. In fact, at the intentional level, this has been widely covered in legislation which is reflected in a number of different ILO Conventions that have been ratified by the Portuguese State and European Union directives as well, which we have transposed into our legislation. There is a general trend for disparity between men and women to decrease in the world of work and in education, as the Director-General recognizes, but women encounter a number of difficulties in marrying family life with employment, and that is a serious obstacle to gender equality. This, along with cultural aspects, is the main cause for women to find difficulties in being represented in the world of work in a number of sectors of the economy in particular, and they are still underrepresented in high-level positions. We then, like the Director-General, feel that we need new approaches to achieve full gender equality. We need to promote a culture of equality more efficiently. We need to overcome cultural barriers, and we need to ensure that men and women enjoy the same opportunities in a wide range of careers. We need to promote a number of different initiatives. We need to promote entrepreneurship. We need to develop skills through education and lifelong learning, and we need greater flexibility where working time is concerned, particularly given the digitalization of the economy and the different technologies that are resulting from that. Companies and enterprises have a pivotal role to play in this. They need to become more competitive, and in order to achieve that they need to focus on human resources and opt for the best skilled among the candidates that they look to recruit, be they women or men. We know that sharing best practices can help with this. There are a number of advantages to be achieved from that in terms of competitiveness, and the Portuguese employers understand that promoting women for high-level positions is also an investment in more competitive, innovative and stimulating working environments, and will lead to an improved labour market in general. Enterprises' productiveness and competitiveness can only be achieved in peaceful and stable working environments where social peace reigns. That begins within enterprises, with workers and employers who know that they can face external threats. On the 26 April 2007, in the European Union, the social partners signed a voluntary agreement on violence and harassment in the workplace, and this seeks to raise awareness among all the social partners of the need to set up a framework where problems can be resolved. In order to achieve this, we need a model that will serve everyone's needs. ILO Convention 100 on equal pay for the work of equal value and Convention 111 on discrimination in employment and occupation state that application of such principles needs to be carried out in a way that is in line with national needs. I would also mention what is stated in that agreement, along the lines of other agreements that have been made between the social partners at the European level. Social dialogue needs to be carried out at all different levels, international, national, sectorial and within each business. We need to ensure that social dialogue is in line with the needs of everyone involved. This is the home of social dialogue, and the ILO is the place for these steps to be taken. We are here, then, to defend gender equality and to fight against violence and harassment at work. Thank you.

Mr Reva

Government (Ukraine)

Mr President, Ministers, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of the Ukrainian tripartite delegation, I would like to greet all the participants of the International Labour Conference. Issues raised by the Director-General on the push for equality at work and in society, the elimination of gender-based violence and harassment at the workplace require joint efforts of the governments and the social partners. The Government of Ukraine pays great attention to promote equal opportunities for women and men in all walks of life. Already, in April 2017, the Government adopted the State Social Programme featuring a comprehensive approach towards equal rights and opportunities for women and men. Particular attention is paid to the world of work with a view to creating discrimination-free working environment. To date, Government non-discriminatory norms were incorporated into the current Labour Code, General Agreement and found reflection in the sub-national collective agreements. To mainstream gender equality concerns, the Government set up the Office of the Gender Equality Commissioner. A review of the list of occupations prohibited for women has reopened as many as 418 occupations to women to ensure equal treatment of women and men. On behalf of the Government of Ukraine, I would reaffirm that we welcome the development and adoption of new ILO standards that address violence and harassment against women and men in the world of work. Mr President, equal rights and opportunities have been an important part of the Government's Poverty Eradication Strategy. It is this idea that laid the foundation for the ongoing reforms, in particular of the pensions. The pension reform, led by the Government, is restoring social justice in determining pension benefits. This was vital for many Ukrainian pensioners, especially for those who received their pensions below the subsistence minimum level. It is important that in our reform effort we are guided by the ILO Convention 102 on minimum standards of social security, which was ratified by Ukraine in 2016. We are proud that Ukraine became the first post-Soviet country that ratified this flagship ILO Convention and the seventh country in the world that ratified it in full. This was a good example of excellent tripartite collaboration to respond to multiple challenges facing our country. Mr President, unfortunately, the development pace of Ukraine is seriously hampered by the continuous Russian aggression against Ukraine. To ensure the respect for human rights of 1.5 million Ukrainian citizens who have been internally displaced as a result of Russian aggression, the Government approved the strategy of integration of IDPs and implementation of long-term solutions to internal displacement until 2020. The Government has found a workable solution for payment of social benefits, including pensions, to Ukrainian citizens who have moved to the government-controlled areas. The Government is currently elaborating procedures that would allow the residents of the temporarily occupied territories of Donetsk and Luhansk regions to receive their due social benefits, including pensions, in their actual place of residence in Ukraine. Mr President, the Government's priority action plan for 2018 envisages the continuation of structural reform in Ukraine, in particular development of a modern and inclusive labour market, profound review of occupational safety and health management systems, ratification of a number of ILO Conventions and groundwork to improve application of international labour standards. I take this opportunity to express our gratitude to the ILO for making available their best technical expertise to help build an inclusive, prosperous and socially coherent society in Ukraine. I thank you.

Worker (Bulgaria)

Dear Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, brothers and sisters. On behalf of Bulgarian workers, I congratulate you and your deputies on your election to such important positions. We support the adoption of a new international labour standard, a Convention supplemented by Recommendation on ending violence and harassment against women and men in the world of work. It will give a definition of the concepts of violence and harassment in the world of work, including gender-based violence and harassment. We should pay attention to how domestic violence impacts women and how the workplace can play a positive role to assist women to live lives free of violence. We are committed to ensure that all workers are free of violence and harassment. Through the tools of social dialogue, social partners in Bulgaria would continue to develop and implement policies to eliminate harassment and violence in the world of work. This is an important national priority in the development and adoption of national action plan for promoting gender equality. Social dialogue is the DNA of the ILO. In my country, tripartite social dialogue is important in shaping the legislative processes on social and labour law, but also on defining comprehensive policy mix for achieving more inclusive and fair society. But the most important form of social dialogue remains the collective bargaining at sectorial and company level. We finished yesterday the recurrent discussions on social dialogue and tripartism, and the renewed political commitment for our campaign for universal ratification of Convention 87 and 98 has been confirmed. The last challenge that social partners in Bulgaria have confronted is the negotiations on minimum wage fixing mechanism. The declared objective is to reflect all the provisions set out in recently ratified ILO Convention 131. We have difficulties in the negotiations due to a lack of consensus on the specific indicators to be included and their weight. We hope that the nearly two year negotiation for a tripartite agreement on a minimum wage will soon become a reality. We are also facing the major of challenge of low wages and incomes and growing inequalities for Bulgarian workers. The average wage, €542 per month in last year, is normally between five and ten times lower than that in the developed EU countries, and compared to the new EU Member States, Bulgarian wages are up to two times lower. Almost 24 per cent of households in the country are below the poverty line, and almost 10 per cent of the Bulgarians are working poor. Over the past five years, there has been a positive trend in share of wage labour compensation in GDP. From almost 37 per cent in 2012, this ratio reached 43 per cent last year, resulting in about 6 billion lev (BGN), almost €3 billion, redistributed to the wage labour as a result of trade union wage increase campaign. We will continue our fight for equal pay for work of equal value, a fundamental principle of the ILO Declaration of Philadelphia which guaranteed decent and fair remuneration of workers. We also count on the ETUC initiatives, supported by ITUC, for the establishment of an alliance for upward wage convergence to be discussed in a forthcoming high-level conference in Sofia on 26 June 2018 within the framework of the Bulgarian presidency of the European Council. During the Bulgarian presidency of the Council of European Union we put as a priority the issues of digitization of work, protection of workers' rights for those working through online platforms and to all self-employed workers. We also imposed the issues of social dialogue, working conditions, working time, the distortions of the implementation of ILO Conventions related to the summarized working time calculation and incomes at the centre of the debate at the Regional Trade Union Conference we held on the key priority of the Bulgarian presidency, namely EU enlargement towards the Western Balkans. Mr President, we expect the reports that were published by the Global Commission of the Future of Work early next year to frame the debate for ILO's centenary conference and to give some particular guidelines as to how to extend the labour law and the social protection to the most needed. The publication of the ILO annual report on violation of rights, enshrined in the core Conventions of the organization, is of great importance for us. Based on its data we shall unite in seeking the best guarantee for respecting the fundamental rights at work. The fight for better social protection and decent working conditions, decent pay for all workers regardless of their employment relationships, must remain our constant goal. I wish you and all of us a successful conference. Thank you very much.

Mr Monckeberg

Government (Chile)

Good afternoon President, Officers. In particular, I would like to extend a very warm welcome to the various bodies and organizations that are representative at the conference from my country, the Workers' Central, the Confederation of Production and Trade, and representatives of the workers and the different bodies such as the CAT, UNT and Conapyme from Chile. It is a great honour for me to extend a very warm greeting to you, on behalf of the Chilean Government, from our President Sebastián Piñera who, once again and with very broad support, has taken on the challenge of leading our country for the next four years. Only a few months after being appointed to the post of Minister for Labour and Social Protection, I have seen that the objectives and founding principles of our government programme are totally in line with the principles and standards which are inspired by this organization, the ILO. We believe in work as a driver, as a motor for social change, and we feel that it is an essential element to help people develop, and therefore we face a great challenge because our administration inherited a weakened labour market where the informal sector was never on the increase and where obviously what we have to do now is create quality jobs. It is our objective to help create 600,000 new, quality jobs with an aim of ensuring that, at the end of the period, we have 9 million Chilean citizens in work, and I really wish to hammer this point home. We're working to have a labour market where it's not just quantity, i.e. the number of jobs that we create, but quality of those jobs. And in this respect we are working to do away with a number of arbitrary discriminations which have hindered full participation of women, young people and persons with disability on the labour market. In the first few months of the Government, we have managed to see the entry into force of the Inclusion Law, which promotes equality between the genders and obviously also guarantees rights, and this based on Article 1 of our founding charter. What we want to do is do away with any kind of arbitrary discrimination in Chile, and also do away with any kind of abuse, and we want to guarantee equal opportunities and guarantee access to the labour market, and we also want to bring about a reduction in the wage gap. It is for this reason that we have very much welcomed the entry into force of the so-called Inclusion Law, work on which had started under the previous Government, and obviously we are going to strive to ensure that it is properly applied. This law, I think, is going to help bring about a more inclusive labour market and also for citizens of our country with disabilities, because up till now the doors have been closed to them. At the same time, we have submitted a draft law to Congress in our country, which will create a so-called special contract for young students, and it means that young people are going to be able to study on the one hand but also work at the same time, carry out a safe and protected work, which is compatible with their studies. And in order to guarantee and increase participation of women on the labour market, President Piñera will be submitting a draft law over the next few days, which will guarantee recognition of the universal right to childcare of children under two years. And, of course, we're also trying to introduce the greater participation of distance working. As I said, what we're trying to do is create a more inclusive labour market, have a greater share out of tasks in the home and improve the quality of life of all of our workers, be they men or women. And with the same strength that we're opening new areas for work, we're also going to be turning our attention to better taxation and a far more stringent respect of labour laws. In order for all of this to happen, then obviously changes are going to have to be made to our current laws in order to bring about the reconciliation between family and working life. We have to adapt and adaptability should not be a synonym of greater precarity. We should be making our labour market, our jobs, more human, and obviously if this is an objective we're setting ourselves as a country, we just don't want to strive for economic growth, we want to ensure that the human quality of our jobs is also increased. If we think about today's children and the pace of technological change, about 50 per cent of the jobs that exist today will not tomorrow, when our 13 and 14 year-olds are going to come onto our labour market, and there is the risk of jobs now being carried out in an automated way. So we have to ensure that our young people have the right kind of skills, and we're obviously striving to ensure that we cater for this as well. There is reform underway, and we're changing our education system in order to take account of these changes, and we're doing this work together with our workers and our trade unions. And we're looking at a paradigm shift because, for the time being, we have to ensure that all of this is properly reflected in any kind of collective bargaining agreement, and these kind of subjects cannot be missing. I'm drawing to a close, President. We'd like to thank the ILO for their very valuable contribution, especially bearing in mind that next year is the centenary of the ILO. And we obviously feel that dialogue and agreement is the only way to guarantee a protection for our workers to bring about a better working environment for everybody concerned. Thank you very much.

Mr Joyce

Worker (Ireland)

Esteemed President, it's an honour to once again address this conference on behalf of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions. I'd like to welcome the Report of the Director-General of The Women at Work Initiative: The Push for Equality. As the report points out, we are still a long way from the goal of equality, and progress towards it is slow, uneven and uncertain. That is why we have put so much effort, during this conference, into the task of negotiating a much needed international standard to guide the fight against violence and harassment in the world of work. This will be a major contribution to the broader push for equality. The last year has also uncovered several incidents of workplace sexual harassment, and congress has called on the Minister for Justice to strengthen current equality legislation to protect workers in such circumstances. In Ireland, on average, women still earn almost 15 per cent less than their male counterparts. The gender pay gap has many causes and solutions, including more collective bargaining. It's also our view that pay transparency in individual organizations would encourage progress by shining a light on the causes of inequality and encouraging employers to address them. A growing consensus between Government, employers and trade unions has emerged on this issue and we hope that the Gender Pay Gap Information Bill will soon be enacted. It has, of course, been a momentous time for women's rights in Ireland of late with 2018 marking the centenary of the suffragette movement, and of course many will be aware of the recent removal by referendum of the issue of termination of pregnancy from our Constitution. The Government need to now legislate for the introduction of a regulated, comprehensive and quality healthcare service that is safe for women and girls in line with international norms. The Irish Government has been playing an active role since taking up a titulaire seat on the Governing Body of this House, and we welcome this commitment, as illustrated by the participation of the President of Ireland, Michael D Higgins in tomorrow's World of Work Conference, and the commitment to ratify the ILO Forced Labour Protocol during 2018. We also look forward to marking the ILO centenary in Ireland during 2019. However, despite a strengthening economy, assuming a relatively benign outcome to Brexit negotiations, and improved labour markets, there's still much to do in tackling decent work deficits in Ireland, including the incidence of precarious work and the need for legislation that delivers improved employment rights for some of the most vulnerable and exploited workers in Ireland, a point linked to the standard setting discussion of this conference. The extent of our low pay problem, the need to tackle racism in our workplace, the low participation rates of people with disabilities in the labour market, the lack of access to quality, affordable childcare, the need to revise our pension system, the lack of implementation of a just transition towards a carbon-free future and the lack of right to representation. These and other related issues arise directly as a result of the absence of a right to collectively bargain in our State. We did make some progress in the 2015 Industrial Relations Amendment Act, but the Decent Work

Agenda will only truly be addressed when we achieve collective bargaining rights where workers can bargain the value of their labour without fear and where members of trade unions can exercise their rights of access to be heard. We'll be highlighting these and other issues as our Government reports on its implementation of the Sustainable Development Goals at the high-level political forum in New York next month. On the issue of social dialogue, we have been working with the Government and Ibec on the development of a formal social dialogue forum that can discuss public policy issues that affect workers and business but which cannot be resolved at workplace level. The Labour Employer Economic Forum, involving Government, business and trade unions, has recently expanded to deal with issues like the cost of housing, the cost of childcare and elder care, the pension crisis, collective bargaining and employment rights. The context of Brexit highlights the compelling case for Government, unions and employers to discuss and agree responses to these and other issues of concern. On housing, for example, a move from public provision of social housing over decades towards a new conventional wisdom that the market could provide these services more efficiently has resulted in thousands of people, including children, being either homeless or living in totally unsuitable accommodation. For a majority of workers, rental costs have become unaffordable, and most do not meet the criteria to successfully apply for a mortgage. This has led to increased pay demands to account for these cost of living factors. We have been seeking support from politicians in our Charter for Housing Rights, and it is in all of our interests to find a solution to this problem, and social dialogue can be an important tool in this regard. Finally, I want to note the report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories and the decent work deficit it outlines. Unemployment in the occupied territories reached the highest level in the world. Job creation, it says, is at best anaemic, and the report goes on to note how these issues cannot be tackled while the occupation continues. It also notes how Gaza is blocked to an extent that tests the limit of endurance, and this is illustrated recently through recent events and the tragic killing and injuring by Israeli forces of innocent protesters and those seeking to assist the injured. Responses need to move beyond words of condemnation, and so we have sought a meeting with our Minister for Foreign Affairs, and have reiterated our view that Israel must face consequences for such actions if there is to be a real peace. To that end the Government needs to support the Occupied Territories Bill currently in our Parliament and formally recognize the decision of our Parliament to finally recognize the State of Palestine. Thank you, President.

Employer (Viet Nam)

Mr Chairman and Madam Chairwoman, ladies and gentlemen, it's a great honour for me, on behalf of the Vietnamese Employer Organization, to address in this plenary session of the International Labour Conference today. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General for his comprehensive report, The Women at Work Initiative: The push for equality, which addresses issues and challenges faced by women in the labour market. The report elaborates on women at work as one of the seven initiatives in the lead up to the ILO 100th anniversary in 2019. Ladies and gentlemen, in the last two decades, Viet Nam has become the major sourcing destination for a number of global manufacturing industries in the process of people integration into global supply chain. Local manufacturers are increasingly faced with the twin challenge of remaining cost effective and competitive on the one hand and meeting growing social and environmental visibility standards on the other.

It is in helping employers overcome this challenge that we see synergies with the work of the ILO whose tripartite structure, labour market expertise and industry support programmes resonate well with our own strategic aims for the Vietnamese economy. Viet Nam employers nowadays play a significant role in contributing to the growth of our country's economy through the intervention and efforts that supports the creation of harmonized industrial relations and a sound environment, for investment. We highly appreciate the ILO initiative, effective cooperation and technical assistance granted to us through programmes and projects in area of legal revision and intervention and social dialogue mechanism strengthening. A leading example of this can be found IN VCCI's active partnership with the Better Work programmes, which since 2009 has been working to promote labour standards and business competitiveness in the fast-growing garment and footwear sector. As part of this collaboration, VCCI has supported initiatives to boost factory level understanding of international labour standards, help employer to create harmonious and productive workplaces for all, and provide important networking opportunities for factories to share good practices on sustainable business while also taking time to listen to business feedback on policy change in future. Another initiative that VCCI has taken the lead since 2015 in advancing socially responsible labour practices in the electronics sector, especially through the newly established Business Coalition in SRLPs, with technical support from ILO and cooperated with MOLISA and VGCL forging partnership approach to developing capacity of the MNEs and their supplier, at the same time strengthening public labour administration The dialogue forum is an important part of the coalition activity to promote socially responsible labour practices in the multinational enterprises, business associations and their suppliers in Viet Nam. It also aims at facilitating policy dialogue between the private sector and the Government on issues and challenges created by the electronic enterprises in Viet Nam today. Ladies and gentlemen, Viet Nam now is on the way to approach the legal framework on labour and employment and its implementation, ensuring the right and benefits for both employers and workers. All Vietnamese employers' contribution to this progress has been made not only by our effort but also in cooperation with our partner as ILO, the Government, the worker representative, especially the assistance of IOE and all our partners, including the ILO ITC Campus in Turin, the Norwegian Enterprise Confederation, the Dutch Employers' Cooperation Programme, etc. I would like to take this opportunity to express my sincere thanks to our partners in this regard and look forward to further assistance from ILO and its member countries. On this occasion, I wish all of you good health and success. Thank you for your attention.

Worker (Nepal)

Honourable Chair, distinguished delegates, sisters and brothers. First of all, please accept my warm greetings on my behalf and the entire workers in Nepal. I am pleased to address the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. It's a very important gathering for all of us to bring issues and challenges, for discussions and find ways how to resolve these problems. After a long fragmentation and having difficulty to get common consensus on workers issues and agenda, we decided to come up with a Joint Trade Union Coordination Centre in 2007, which is an example of collaborative work to protect workers' rights, and achieved its intended objective in social dialogue and collective bargaining. Our practice of collective work through joint trade union had given unanimous voice and build strengthen among workers in Nepal. Over 72 years of Nepalese Trade Union movement now must active and collaborative not only protecting workers' rights but contributing industrial peace and harmony. Due to the unification of the scattered trade union centres, we have been able to address common issues and strengthen our voice which has successfully proven unity in diversity. The new Constitution of Nepal has established a right to employment, right to form union and right to collective bargaining as fundamental rights of workers. Our Constitutions has also addressed the issues related to the workers like right to free health service, food, resident, elimination of gender discrimination, right to safe motherhood and reproductive health, prohibition of child labour, etc. Labour Act has been promulgated after a persistent effort of Joint Trade Union Coordination Centre. The Act, which was achieved after the joint effort of the Government of Nepal, JTUCC and employers, has grouped all the activities of workers and their rights within the legal territory. Let me highlight new Labour Act that covers the following provisions. Child labour shall not be entertained. Discrimination based on the gender, race, religion, caste shall not be entertained. Equal wage for equal job. Assurance of right of workers to form union. Working hours of labourers shall not exceed eight hours per day or 48 hours per week. Provision of health insurance and accident insurance and provision of provident fund. Recently, Contributory Social Security Act has also been passed, which is now under implementation phase. We are prioritizing and designing social security schemes such as health, maternity, accident, disability, retirement, unemployment and implementation. There shall be the contribution for the workers as well as the Government and employers in such security plans. Social Security Fund Act has been promulgated as an effort to rescue workers from any unforeseen circumstances. Now we have huge challenges for effective implementation of these important laws and their provisions in Nepal. I appreciate the ILO's support in all these aspects and also request to continue in future. There are many other issues from workers' side, such as formation of labour commission, participation in policy-making process, right to select for candidacy and vote from work place. Other major issues include unemployment issues, low wage, implementation of agreements, election of CBA, problems of migrant workers, labour audit and ratification of ILO Convention 87. We'll continue our dialogue and advocacy with our newly formed government with comfortable majority now. Respected Chair, we believe our attempts help play a crucial role in ensuring decent work and also for attainment of Sustainable Development Goals. We have considered social tripartite dialogue as vital, and we are in attempt for its implementation. This has been proven by the involvement of Government, employer and worker during the Promulgation of Labour Act and Social Security Act. Nepalese workers have been raising voice and creating pressure to Government against violence and harassment against women and men at the workplace. It is a matter of delight for us to raise these vital issues in this glorious ILO conference. I would like to acknowledge ILO Director-General and Governing Body and wish that this conference shall ratify the Convention. Nepal has stepped into a new era of political stability that will bring peace and development for Nepali people and workers. We believe Nepal Government put decent work in the centre of planning and implementation to achieve inclusive economic growth. Lastly, I wish for grand success of this important conference. Thank you.

Worker (Mexico)

Here we are here to define the future of work, but we see this important initiative, which has been put to us by the Director-General, showing great vision. The Confederation of Workers of Mexico, which is a democratic labour union, wants to contribute to this review and try to help to adopt tripartite actions and strategies which will help to combat poverty and the precarization of the lives of people via decent work, an inclusive and green economy, and building on a development model which will lead to legal certainty and provide the necessary framework for companies to thrive with respect also for the rights and the economic and social protection of workers. Now we need to try and ensure decent work for future generations. The future work indeed is the future of human development. Now, when it comes to the future of work, we've got to take a look and start with where we are at present in terms of the current trends in the world of work. Our economies, in most countries, are right now not coming up with the goods when it comes to providing decent work. Employment and wages are only improving in just a few countries in our region. Generally speaking, they're moving towards precarity in terms of contracts and wages. The informality of work is something which is affecting increasing categories of workers and also new ways that work is being organized and production organized. To our workers, we would like to take into account all the different factors which are going to be important for the future of work. Yes, technological factors are very important, but what we as union organizers are more worried about is the future of labour relations and labour administration. What's at stake is addressing the widening social gap. The gaps will increase and inequality will increase if we do not rethink our social structures. In a nutshell, what we're seeing is so many cases where there's an increasing imbalance between capital and work, and the workers are the ones who are suffering from this. We need to make policy changes so that we can move away from this determinism that is inherent in many economic and trade policies, where people assume there is nothing we can do about the trends, that nothing can be done to combat inequality. That's why, in this period of digitalization, and with the ever increasing use of global supply chains, the State must define and implement the proper solutions for the future. Ones that will lead to an inclusive and fair economy. One that will provide us at the same time collective social protection, sufficient both in cities and in rural zones. We also must take a look at the general division of labour. We must do away with any violence and harassment in the workplace. We must lay the foundations so that in the future there is no tolerance for inequality in general, and when it comes to gender in particular. We've got to eradicate violence from the world of work. We must respect individuals and persons as individuals, and the ILO needs to adopt the proper norms as we move forward as we see these problems before us. Now as we look at the future, we must do away with short-termism and the lack of integration, which so often is the case for public policy, and we see these policies often are just not simply up to the job of trying to attack the underlying sectorial problems. We must have a future society which is inclusive. The future will require a greater organization of the workers for the just defence of their interests of tripartism and for collective bargaining arrangements and relations. If we are going to meet the goals laid down in Agenda 2030 of the United Nations, we have got to be crystal clear. We've got to be fully aware, and we've got to see just how important tripartite approaches will be in making sure that we do ensure human development and decent work.

Government (Barbados)

Mr Chairperson, distinguished delegates, it gives me great pleasure to stand before you and to address the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference on behalf of the Government of Barbados. I first wish to commend the Director-General on his report and specifically to his highlighting of the need for the advancement of the World of Work initiative and the need to focus on gender equality. In recent times, we have observed a microscope placed on two issues affecting women at work, and that is the issues of sexual harassment and violence. While most of these allegations have been made, or are usually made by females, we know that this phenomenon is not restricted to females only but also to males, men and boys. This is in fact a gender neutral issue. Having ratified the eight fundamental Conventions which address the subjects that are considered as fundamental principles and rights at work, Barbados has taken its commitment to these and other Conventions quite seriously. Indeed, my country is seeking to ensure that our labour legislation is being amended and, where necessary, designed to have a positive and effective impact on our Decent Work Agenda. I must emphasize that Barbados is not alone, since a number of countries in the Caribbean region have sought to address, and are addressing, the issues of sexual harassment as well as discrimination in the workplace. I am pleased to report that the Parliament of Barbados passed the Sexual Harassment Prevention Act in October 2017. This legislation, among other things, makes provision for the protection of employees, in both the public and private sectors, from sexual harassment at their workplaces, and it also provides a framework for the reporting of sexual harassment cases by employees as well as a method of resolving such cases. The passing of this legislation follows a comprehensive programme established by the Government of Barbados, through its Ministry of Labour and Social Partnership Relations, to review and where necessary revise existing labour laws and to examine trends in the labour market to inform the creation of new labour laws. As is customary, local employers' and workers' organizations, as well as other interest groups, were engaged in the process, and we continue to engage them. I'm also pleased to report that Barbados is currently working on wider discrimination legislation in the form of the Employment Prevention of Discrimination Bill. Barbados remains committed to the application of ethical business principles such as equality, diversity and the need to treat every employee with dignity and with respect. The Government has signalled its commitment to ensuring that workplace environments are conducive to the personal development, safety and high level performance of employees through robust collaboration with our social partners and the creation of relevant legislation. Mr Chairperson, while legislative control of sexual harassment is relatively new, the behaviour which has prompted such regulatory measures has long been institutionalized and defended by its practitioners. Now that it has been catapulted into international focus like never before, the time appears ripe to effectively address this issue. We can be nothing less than thorough in our approach. We must ensure that our laws are as exhaustive and coherent as possible. We must be prepared to go that one step further when required and fill any existing gaps in our legislation. I am therefore heartened, Mr Chairperson, that the issue of violence and harassment against women and men in the world of work has a place on the agenda of the ILC this year, where it can be fully ventilated and where we can have commitment to action to eradicate this scourge through the creation of the appropriate standard. A vision of a world of work that is free from violence and harassment in its many forms is not by any means an unattainable one. What it requires is a concerted effort and steadfast dedication to achieve what some may deem impossible. For those who might adopt this way of thinking, I would admonish you to embrace the words of Mr Nelson Mandela, former President of South Africa, who simply said, "It always seems impossible until it's done". Mr Chairperson, distinguished delegates, I thank you.

Ms Conway

Government (United States)

Good afternoon. It's an honour to address the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference on behalf of the United States. Thank you, Director-General Ryder, for your report on the ILO's Women at Work initiative. The United States strongly supports empowering women in the workplace. It is an auspicious time to be with you. This week marks the 90th anniversary of the creation of the United States Department of Labour's Women's Bureau, an agency that focuses solely on women in the workforce in the effort to foster, promote and develop the welfare of wage earners, job seekers and retirees of the United States, improve working conditions, advance opportunities for profitable employment and ensure work-related benefits and rights. On the day the Women's Bureau was established, 5 June 1920, women made up only 21 per cent of the American workforce. Today, American women are in a much stronger position. In 2018, women make up 47 per cent of the American workforce. Last week, the Department of Labour's Bureau of Labour Statistics released employment information for adult women, reporting a 3.3 per cent unemployment rate. The lowest in 18 years. Women own more than 10 million businesses, and of all demographic groups, the fastest growing entrepreneur segment is women in the American Hispanic community. For the first time on record, the number of American job openings exceeded the number of job seekers. Now is the time that America is looking to expand even more opportunities for women. Domestically, we are focused on increasing demand-driven skills education and supporting policies to help all Americans join and stay in the workforce. As representatives of our nations meet and we exchange similar stories regarding the need for skilled work, so many of the nations represented today transformed their workforces through apprenticeship programmes. Similarly, we have pushed for an unprecedented expansion in apprenticeship programmes to meet the needs of a vibrant economy. The expansion of high-quality apprenticeship programmes is complemented by our commitment to offer more opportunity to women in the science, technology, engineering and mathematics fields, where we see higher wages, more demand and faster growth rates. Another important issue facing working women is that of parental leave and childcare. In half of American homes with children under the age of one, all parents work. No family should have to choose between working to put food on the table and spending time with a new-born or newly adopted child. Labour force attachment is very important. Paid family leave supports labour force attachment, leading to higher productivity and lower turnover rates. That is why, for the first time in history, our Administration included a paid parental leave proposal in the budget request to Congress. We have also sought to increase access to affordable childcare through an increase this year to the Childcare and Development Block Grants, which fund state-level efforts to provide childcare services to low income families. On a global scale, we've collaborated with key partners to launch global initiatives that seek to increase women's access to digital technology, entrepreneurship and family-sustaining work. These include the WomenConnect Challenge, which aims to close the digital divide while helping women pull their families out of extreme poverty, and the Women Entrepreneurs Finance Initiative, or WEFI, undertaken with the World Bank to help women in developing countries gain access to finance markets and networks necessary to start and grow a business. We strongly believe that employment opportunities for women must provide safe working conditions and fair wages. This past December, the United States Department of Labour developed a toolkit for service providers and policy-makers to help reduce the risk of child labour and other harmful labour practices in women-led enterprises. Indeed, much more needs to be done globally to improve the quality of women's employment and to fight egregious labour abuses affecting girls and women, like child labour, forced labour and human trafficking. More than 64 million girls globally are victims of child labour, and more than half of all victims of forced labour are women and girls. The Department of Labour is working with many other countries, as well as the ILO, to prevent women and girls from being victims of these abusive practices. For example, in Zambia and Uganda we are funding projects to increase access for adolescent girls and vulnerable women to decent work and high-quality skills training. In Paraguay, we're helping to develop future female leaders and innovators by helping them gain access to financial literacy, numeracy, entrepreneurship and in-demand skills. And in Ghana, we're working with adult female household members to reduce household reliance on child labour in the cocoa sector. To close, in the words of the first female United States Supreme Court Justice, Sandra Day O'Connor, "Society as whole benefits immeasurably from a climate in which all persons, regardless of race or gender, may have the opportunity to earn respect, responsibility, advancement and remuneration based on ability." The United States remains steadfast in its commitment to help advance the economic empowerment of women globally. It is an honour to provide these remarks, and I thank the Director-General and the ILO for your partnership on these important efforts. Thank you.

Mr Tsivkach

Employer (Ukraine)

Mr President, your Excellencies, distinguished representatives of governments, workers, employers, ladies and gentlemen, it gives me great pleasure to congratulate you all on behalf of the joint representative body of Ukrainian employers, at national level, on the great work you do to improve work environment and deliver on UN Sustainable Development Goals Agenda. We strongly support gender equality principle at work and universally and advocate on a continuous basis for better rights of women at work in Ukraine and internationally. Nonetheless, the inequality is still present and has many faces, among which harassment at work, unequal salaries, inability to effectively progress up the career ladder and many other that are not less important. These issues have been tackled with joint tripartite effort in Ukraine and determined desire for a change for the better. Gender equality is a fundamental principle for effective future work and tolerant social relations. It lays foundation for fairness, understanding and solidarity in our society. We need to admit and always remember that there is no perspective for peaceful future and economic development without these three pillars. In the modern world, employers must take a stronger role in terms of social responsibility. Business is no longer about making profit alone but also about creating enabling environment for decent work and life. There is no excuse for selfish market behaviour, abuse of workers' rights of any gender, or non-participation in essential international initiatives like the UN SDG Agenda. This rule applies for national and international employers in any country, including Ukraine. Moreover, joint effort of local and foreign businesses to improve regulatory policy and business environment in Ukraine must be aligned and agreed between stakeholders. We should be partners and not adversaries, as Secretary-General Guy Ryder rightly stated in his speech. However, even today we feel misunderstanding in such sensitive areas like public procurement, export and import policies. We certainly support fair economic competition and free market. However, our national interests must be protected in a way that corresponds to best international processes. Reforms must be balanced and protect interests of all participants, including national producers and workers. Government, international organizations and development agencies must bear this in mind, and their work in this regard is much appreciated. Taking this opportunity, we express gratitude to ILO for the joint project we did on enabling environment for sustainable enterprises in Ukraine, and we look forward to future cooperation. Strong business environment in Ukraine is key preposition for national social consensus, decent work conditions and effective contribution to the UN SDG agenda. Our industrial policy requires urgent improvement in a way that can answer modern challenges associated with markets re-orientation and global geopolitical shifts that affect economies. Ukrainian employers and workers have much to offer to the international community but support is required. We still struggle with the launch of the national expert credit agency and hope that it will start effective work soon. We need to align existing, and sign new, bilateral and multilateral trade and cooperation agreements that would allow us to revive national industrial capacities. This applies to all industries, including energy, machinery, equipment, consumer goods and certainly to agriculture, where we need to create a solid, value-added chain based on carefully thought-through land reform. There is no room for mistakes here. Ukraine has to deal with numerous challenges that bear a serious threat to economic and territorial integrity. Among those that affect business and workers are big scale forced migration within Ukraine, about 1.5 million people since 2014. International labour migration and brain drain of skilled workers. Today, over 5 million of Ukrainians live and work abroad, many of those may work illegally, hence their working rights may be affected. Shortage of suitable professional education courses and facilities on national level, and other important issues that shall be urgently addressed and resolved. Effective application of ILO Conventions on national level, respect to tripartite interests and needs, balanced and thoughtful integration into global markets and other factors, can help achieve good results in this area and secure peace and the future for work in Ukraine. We call on all employers throughout the world and other tripartite constituents to foster cooperation and ensure safe and decent work for next generations to come. We live in one world and support to each other should be our multicultural natural law. Next year, ILO and its members will celebrate the big date, and it should become a milestone for future of work. Ukrainian employers will work hard on ideas how to effectively contribute to Centenary Initiatives, including all seven of them. Moreover, Ukraine is a proud member of the UN family ... [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:08] ... safer and better place to live and work in. We need to remember that our main goal is not to build walls around us but to create happy and tolerant society. Once again, I thank you, all parties, for their hard work, and thank you for the opportunity to speak today. Thank you.

Government (India)

President of the 107th ILC, Director-General, ILO, Vice-Chairs, from workers, employers, dignitaries on the dais. Ladies and gentlemen, it is indeed a matter of great pleasure for me to address the ILC. I take this opportunity to compliment the

---

DG ILO for a very comprehensive and relevant report on the Women at Work initiative. Women are an integral part of our economies. A country's growth has a direct link to the woman's participation in the economy. A low female labour force participation rate is a matter of concern for all of us. The Indian Constitution upholds the principle of equality and no gender biased discrimination. India is taking concerted efforts to change this mindset and increase the active participation of women in the labour market. We have legislative measures in place to ensure the equal wages for men and women. We have rectified the ILO conventions concerning equal remuneration and no discrimination in respect of employment or occupation. However, we have about 400 million workforce engaged in the unorganized sector where the majority are women. As a result, we also face policy implementation issues. Beti Bachao Beti Phadao scheme has been launched to ensure survival and participation. India is one of the very few countries where the maternity benefit is as high as 26 weeks. Maternity benefits are also allowed to commissioning mothers and adopting mothers. The Maternity Benefit Act has enabling provisions for facilitating work from the home and crèche facilities for increasing the participation of women in the workforce. We need to adapt a multi-pronged strategy to promote all-round equality for the women in the labour market. Women face discrimination due to a strong traditional mindset. This also means that any initiative for positive discrimination runs the risk of creating perverse incentives for the market to keep women out of it. Our overall approach should be to change the traditional gender roles in the labour market. We can have policies to promote and incentivize the employment and training of women in the male-dominated sectors. We also need to promote the traditionally women-dominated sectors in terms of better productivity, wages and working conditions. This will have the impact of attracting women to such sectors for work. We are taking initiatives for increasing employability of women and women entrepreneurs. The Support to Training and Employment Programme has been launched to provide the skills that enable women to become self-employed entrepreneurs. Dedicated online platforms like Mahila E-HAAT have been launched for women to sell their products. The Pradhan Mantri MUDRA Scheme provides the soft loans to the small women entrepreneurs. More than 70 per cent of the borrowers under this scheme are women. Over the years, Self Help Groups have proven to be the great medium for social and economic empowerment of rural women. These are volunteer associations of women founded with the aim to mobilize their savings and to meet their credit needs. They also act as a delivery mechanism for various other services like entrepreneur training, livelihood promotions and community development programs. Approximately 8.6 million Self Help Groups have saving deposits of over 161 billion rupees (INR) with the banks. It is estimated that these Self Help Groups cover more than 100 million rural households. In order to ensure the safety of women at the workplace, we have enacted the Sexual Harassment of Women at Workplace Act 2013 which provides for a redress mechanism in cases of sexual harassment, even in the smallest of the unorganized workplace. The Working Woman Hostel Scheme has been launched that aims to promote the availability of safe and conveniently located accommodation for the working woman with day care facilities for their children. We suggest that the Women at Work initiative of the ILO should be further strengthened. The ILO should also work on improving the labour statistics to account for women's contribution in the economy, especially in the case of unpaid work. The world community should get together to ensure that the future work for women should be free from decent work deficits. We look forward to productive deliberations on this ILC agenda in terms concerning women. Thank you.

Government (San Marino)

Mr President, distinguished delegates, the topic of this year's conference is one of the main challenges facing countries today, increasing the participation of women in the labour market while ensuring equality both in terms of wages and in terms of job opportunities. Many countries, including San Marino, must face this challenge of low participation of women in the labour market, pay gaps and lack of opportunities. Luckily, San Marino can rely on a strong production and manufacturing sector that still accounts for over 31 per cent of GDP and employs more than 9,000 people, almost 50 per cent of the total workforce in our republic. In this period of economic upturn however, data still shows a persistent gender gap in the access to employment. Indeed, the unemployment rate in the strict sense, which includes people immediately available to work, is now around 4 per cent among men and 7.5 per cent among women. This testifies to differences in the labour market. San Marino is about to adopt substantial, targeted economic incentives which will be granted to companies that will hire, in the next few months, women with contracts of employment of indefinite duration. These incentives will be granted in particular to companies providing access to part-time work, so as to meet the growing needs of many San Marino women workers. Developing economic policies and incentives aimed at specific categories of workers is crucial, but it is not enough. It is essential to favour the establishment and the development of companies in sectors traditionally occupied by women, such as trade and services. San Marino has developed measures to open up its market to commercial undertakings, and we hope that this will lead to good results in the next few months. On the other end, in San Marino there are no challenges linked to wage differentials between women and men for equal work. I believe that the San Marino national collective bargaining model based on the erga omnes principle is an effective safeguard against this phenomenon. In any case, our Government must work even harder to strengthen the fight against undeclared and unlawful employment because it is precisely within this form of work that exploitation and non-respect of rights are hidden. This will be discussed with social partners in the coming months. With regard to the issues of the social dialogue, I would like to point out that San Marino recently decided to strengthen the roles and the functions of the Labour Commission. This is a tripartite body made up of representatives of the Government, of the workers and of the employers which used to deal only with the administrative procedures. With the new law, its function changed and the Commission is now responsible for training and obligation for unemployed people, management of employment list, provision of social safety nets and much more. The tripartite management model entails intense interaction among the parties, which are required to dialogue on the most important elements of the labour market. Finally, I would like to mention a first test on the involvement of workers in company decisions. The San Marino Government has recently established an Agency for Economic Development, a body jointly controlled by the state and by businesses, whose aim is to promote the country abroad and which will also work as a chamber of commerce. The Constitution of the agency provides for the establishment of a two-person committee, appointed by workers, which shall be constantly informed by agency management on the strategic decisions of the company. In other words, the committee will not enjoy powers of direct management, but it will represent a way to actively involve workers in the business process. Thank you very much.

Government (Honduras)

Distinguished delegates, distinguished workers' representatives, distinguished employers' representatives, on behalf of my Government I wish to extend a warm welcome and warm greetings to the presidency of the conference and all those present. President, Honduras is experiencing a new historic stage in its history. Over the last five years, we have enshrined individual freedoms and the ability to exercise political rights. We are fully involved in all international fora. We are engaged in active diplomatic relations with more than 100 countries, and trade, financial and services exchanges have enabled us to enjoy positive economic growth. Progress in terms of public security and social protection programmes are noteworthy indeed. The Honduras 2020 Plan is Honduras' most significant ever economic growth initiative with promotion of investment in four sectors. The aim is to generate 600,000 jobs over five years and to attract investment to the tune of some $13 billion. Our goal is to generate high rates of growth by attracting investment as well as fostering exports and wholesale generation of jobs by 2020. In addition to these efforts, we are engaged in housing projects for workers in the maquila sector, with more than 3,000 jobs for seafarers, and strengthening of the Euro Plus labour and Euro Plus jobs projects with support of the EU, and the establishment of the task force for job creation, as well as opportunities and revenue with a special inter-institutional structure within the executive for coordinating work deriving from the Honduras State National Employment Policy with four key objectives: competitiveness, job creation, a business-friendly environment and development of human capital. In addition, we have seen an overhaul of the structure of government to enable better efficiency and effectiveness through the Department For General Government Coordination with joint general coordinators and their respective sectorial technical offices on governance, infrastructure, services and public enterprises, and the Office For Prevention, Security And Defence. President, as part of this conference, and pursuant to Convention 87, we have reported to the Committee on the Application of Standards as to progress in security and human rights over the reporting period, and we have been able to show that the majority of cases under review have been prosecuted as criminal offences. Further, Honduras, over the last two government terms, has made special efforts to improve public security whilst combating impunity, bolstering a system of social protection and increasing the effectiveness and efficiency of service provision in education and health as well as social security, political rights and inclusiveness for the most vulnerable sectors of the population, as well as inroads in terms of a more fair society. In particular, in the labour sphere, the new Labour Inspection Act which is in force has gradually led towards a new compliance culture. 32,268 inspections have been carried out to date, and these reflect an 81 per cent increase in rectification of violations found in enterprises. Thanks to this, 430,304 workers have benefited of the 590,442 total. In other words, 73 per cent compliance with the goals cumulatively for 2017-2018. At the same time, since the entry into force of the Labour Inspection Act, a total of $1,057,793.51 has been levied in fines for various labour law violations, with a total figure of $63,701.41 for violations of trade union law, and $188,199.22 for obstruction of labour inspectorates. This context has also fostered freedom of association, and there have been a number of applications for granting of legal personality, with a total of 26 registered trade unions in the period 2014 to March 2018. At the same time, I would inform you that there are currently 11 applications for trade union status being heard, with 37 new unions in the last four years. President, in order to apply Article 6 of the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention 169, the Government of Honduras has enjoyed the support and technical assistance of the ILO, leading to the Bill on Free, Prior and Informed Consent which has duly been revised by this organization. This process involved an inclusive process, bringing together 102 organizations and at least 1,300 people. [vgr INTERRUPTION 5:59] Lastly, we wish to indicate that Honduras will continue as a State to respect human rights. We reaffirm that respect, protection and promotion of human rights is at the very heart of all activities being carried out by the state. I thank you.

Government (France)

Thank you, President. Ladies and gentlemen, delegates, France would like to thank the Director-General for the presentation of his report on the actions of the ILO for the two-year period 2016-2017. Progress made by the ILO when it comes to promoting social justice via decent work should be saluted. To discuss the results of its action, the ILO will become stronger and will reinforce its role in world governance. The organization, throughout this two-year period, built on the work that it had done in the past. It recalled the Declaration on the fundamental principles and rights at work and also the Convention on the elimination of the worst forms of child labour. France has fully supported these initiatives and recently again supported the protocol on the Convention on forced labour which it ratified in 2016. Mr President, a report on Women at Work and the seven initiatives for the centenary have been presented to this conference. Now, the way that this report ties in, and the discussions which have been undertaken here on violence and harassment against men and women in the world of work, is a perfect illustration of the link between these two subjects. This is something of major importance for us all. It certainly is for France. The President of our country, the French Republic, has said that equality between men and women is to be one of the major causes of his mandate. Our Parliament has adopted a bill to combat violence, be it sexual or sexist violence, and working with the Minister for Work and the Secretary of State for Equality Between Men and Women have presented an action plan to achieve a true equality between men and women in the world of work and to combat against sexist and sexual violence. This action plan has five main priority areas of action. First of all, the mustering of the social partners. Secondly, the training of those involved, including the labour inspectorates, and the dissemination of information and raising of sensitivity, and also victim support, and finally sanctions for those who transgress. Today, the voice of victims will be heard. The adoption of a Convention with a corresponding Recommendation is the reflection of the vitality and the ability of the ILO to meet the aspirations of society. Coming to such an agreement during the year of the centenary will be yet further proof that social dialogue and tripartism are the best way to meet the challenges faced by the world of work. President, in his report, the Director-General has underlined just how important inequality leads to injustice and instability. This, the centenary of the ILO, particular attention will be put upon the organization as it deals with the major challenges before it. The role that it should play to fully meet the Sustainable Development Goals will be determinant. The ILO should, at this point in time, reaffirm its unique tripartite role to take its place in world governance. France is aware of the major progress that has been made by the ILO to try and meet the different goals and objectives which were laid down in the Constitution of the organization and also the Philadelphia Declaration of 1944. Nonetheless, much remains to be done to meet those goals. To undertake this, the ILO should reinforce its role within the system of global governance. The different organizations of the multilateral system need to coordinate and integrate in all their different dimensions in a consistent and coherent approach. The ILO should do this within the context of the United Nations system for development, a process which is undergoing reform, fully supported by France, and being undertaken by the Secretary General of the United Nations. For these reasons, France believes that a declaration of the centenary in 2019 should be adopted. We need to reaffirm that the universal principles of the Philadelphia Declaration are still relevant today. It is important that we affirm today indeed that labour is not a commodity. These principles open a new horizon for the initiatives of the centenary, particularly the Future of Work Initiative. For France, it is via such a declaration, an ambitious declaration, that we can best take a look at the future of work and its prospects. A declaration of the centenary could put forward a plan of action aimed at guiding the work of the organization, building on the principles of the Declaration of Philadelphia and the major changes which the world of work is currently undergoing. With this in mind, it could take into account the report which the Global Commission of the Future of Work is to produce at the start of 2019. President, as we now enter into the second century of the ILO, you can count on the constructive spirit and commitment and support of France as we see the organization pursue its mandate for social justice. Thank you.

Government (Spain)

Thank you very much, President. Honourable delegates, I would like to start off by congratulating the ILO and in particular the Director-General, Mr Guy Ryder, for the excellent work that they have done in the run up to, and during the course of, the 107th International Labour Conference. In the same way, I would also like to say that Spain fully agrees with the issues that are being dealt with during this conference. This is a conference which is going to be tackling issues which are of essential importance for the world of work such as social dialogue, tripartism, the fight against violence and harassment of men and women at work, and also the contribution of the International Labour Organization to cooperation and development in support of the Sustainable Development Goals. And we agree and give our full support to all of these. You are no doubt aware that it is a few years now since Spain has emerged from the very tough years of economic and financial crisis. Nevertheless, we have not yet seen a full recovery of our labour market in terms of both quantity and the quality of the labour market. We still continue to face very important challenges, just like other member States of the ILO, and this when it comes to creating better job opportunities for those people who are looking for work and also better job opportunities for those who already have a job but would like to have a better quality job, i.e. better remunerated, a more sustainable job with better pay and over a longer period. We have made very many efforts since 2008, and we continue to do so, especially for those groups which were hardest hit by the crisis, such as young people, persons with a disability, older workers or the long term unemployed. In order to do this work, we feel that it is essential that we strengthen our international cooperation with other countries and international bodies because they, without a doubt, can provide us with their own experience and know-how. The ILO has been, and will continue to be, a key partner in trying to do this work, and Spain has been collaborating with the ILO ever since it was created, and we have been strengthening the joint work that we do together. We have participated in initiatives which are of particular relevance such as the Global Initiative on Decent Jobs for Youth, because education is key, and we have made a commitment to the ILO Future of Work

---

Centenary Initiative in 2009. We are carrying out national dialogues at the autonomous regional level and within the universities, and we will continue with our commitment on the application of standards, ratifying Conventions and ILO protocols, the most recent of these being the 2014 protocol relating to the Convention on forced labour, and thus consolidating one of the instruments that has been most ratified by the organization. As far as Spain is concerned, the fight against violence and harassment of men and women at the world of work is a key priority for our country, and it is one of the essential focuses of this conference. Evidence of the importance we attach to this was the approval in September 2017 of a cross-party pact against gender-based violence, one of the most important cross-party pacts or agreements which we have managed to adopt in the history of our democracy, and which obviously will be marking the roadmap over the next five years. And one of the measures in this pact merits a special attention, i.e. through the representation of Spain at the ILO, to promote an international agreement against gender-based violence at the place of work. In the context of social dialogue, once again we want to try and make progress and have consensus between the organizations of workers and employers, which has allowed Spain to make progress in social policy and also improve its productivity and competitiveness of the economy. Our country is obviously firmly committed to social dialogue and is aware that it is an essential pillar for our progress. And perhaps if I now can refer to another essential access of our work, the 2030 agenda and complying with the Sustainable Development Goals. We have our commitment to setting up in September 2017, which is what we have already done, a high level group, with the twofold objective to coordinate the Spanish position and everything we need to do in order to meet the Agenda 2030. To conclude, President, I would like to reaffirm the commitment of the Government of Spain to continue the dynamism of the Spanish economy and to help bring about an increase in employment, all of which we want to do within a climate of dialogue and social inclusion, which will help us to promote sustainable growth and provide quality public services, thank you.

Employer (Zambia)

Conference President, distinguished delegates, I am pleased to have this opportunity to make some remarks on the Report of the ILO Director-General, presented to the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. The DG's report has touched on a number of issues in terms of activities in the review of the decent work results in the past two years and in providing evidence of areas in the efforts of the ILO in making a difference in impacting on peoples' lives through policy formulation and results-based projects. May I, on behalf of my Federation, commend the Governing Body and the DG on the milestones achieved in the area of helping member States in promoting social justice through decent work, social dialogue and tripartism. Distinguished delegates, my country, Zambia, has benefited immensely from the technical support offered by the ILO Office over the years and during the past two years covering the DG's current report through the field office in Lusaka, Zambia. Through this technical support, Zambia has been working on the Social Protection Floor by developing a comprehensive social protection policy that has proposed to establish a National Social Protection Council which will be a coordinating structure of the National Social Protection Policy. The new policy on social protection has also provided a window to expand the mandate of the Social Security And Insurance Regulatory Authority to include prudential regulation and supervision of both the public and the private pension schemes in situations of insolvency and severe investment loss. On the subject of fundamental principles and rights at work, the Zambian Federation of Employers has always been committed to ensuring that the employers in Zambia are encouraged to formulate workplace policies and implement such policies in compliance with the Zambian labour laws that have been formulated based on the ILO labour standards that promote fundamental principles and rights at work. The ZFE will continue encouraging employers in Zambia to respect these fundamental principles and rights at work for every worker in the country. Mr President, distinguished delegates, during the year 2017, the Zambian Federation of Employers participated in the review of the Zambian labour laws, through the tripartite consultative labour council, with a view of ensuring maximum protection of both the employers' and the workers' fundamental principles and rights at work. In this process, the ZFE and these social partners also ensured that the Zambian labour laws are designed in a manner that does not hinder investment flow in the Zambian economy. May I also use this opportunity to call on those investment funds to come and invest in Zambian, in the different sectors of our economy, and you will be assured of yielding better returns from your investment. Conference President, distinguished delegates, the ongoing discussion in the Committee on ending violence and harassment in the world of work, whose aim is to develop an instrument to protect workers from acts of violence and harassment in the workplace, once developed and domesticated by member States, will strengthen national mechanisms of ensuring protection of workers from being subjected to acts of violence and harassment. However, in formulating the instrument we urge the social partners to exercise flexibility and avoid placing costly obligations on the employers, as doing so may lead to implementation challenges at national level. Mr President, the DG's report to this conference has raised the serious concern that the world of work has been unfair to the women, indicating that only a handful of women have made it to the top of the corporate world while the majority of our women are in low-paying jobs. They are over-represented in informal and non-standard forms of employment. They have continued to be paid less than men globally, even when they do the same work, or work of equal value, and are likely to be subjected to violence and harassment at work. While we are aware that some employers globally are fully committed to continuing making progress on developing women as a critical talent and pool, we call on everyone, the public institutions, the private sector, through our employers organization, workers organization and other stakeholders to provide the extra push necessary for equal opportunities and integration of women at the workplace. The ILO office should continue with its global work on gender equality and non-discrimination and should be free, both human and financial resources, to the field offices to support the work of the ILO constituents in making a difference to address the gender inequality issues so far raised. Finally, Mr President, distinguished delegates, let me comment on the ILO's global work on international labour standards which, according to the DG's report, placed special emphasis on effectively engaging the ILO ... [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:40] ... commend this work, as it ensures that the labour standards, where necessary, were revised to be up to date and relevant for the changing world. I thank you very much.

Government (Italy)

Ministers, delegates, workers, employers, members of unions, ladies and gentlemen, new technologies, sharing economy, globalization are creating increasing opportunities for enterprises and make new goods and services more and more available for our citizens, but they may also open doors to increasing risks of marginalization and exploitation in new forms. We have to tackle the challenges of the new economy, not to fight trends that are positive and irreversible but to ensure to respect the rights of our citizens to ensure that people continue to be at the centre of any transformation. Italy therefore supports the initiative taken by Director-General Ryder to launch a worldwide reflection on the future of work, and we are extremely pleased about the recent developments and achievements. ILO is once again proving to be a vital organization, capable of adapting to the new challenges with both flexibility and leadership. We intend to continue to actively contribute to this initiative. Italy developed a tripartite dialogue on the future of work during the last two years, and the new Government that we have in Italy is now determined to move into action. We are ready to implement concrete initiatives to address the new challenges facing the world of work, starting from the issue of workers in the platform and gig economy, and the ILO will continue to represent an important reference and guide for us. Transformations in the world of work represent a great opportunity but can also deepen, if not properly managed, inequalities and poverty. We therefore believe that they should be accompanied by investments and macroeconomic policies to achieve the dream objective of economic growth and employment together with active labour markets and social protection policies to redress labour market imperfections and inequalities. These latter policies feature prominently in the Government's program. They include activation strategies to increase labour market participation of women, young people and disadvantaged groups, such as persons with disabilities. This is in full alignment with the goals of the 2030 Agenda on sustainable development, which Italy is committed to achieve, both domestically and through its development cooperation programs. Through our policy priorities, we do really want to ensure that no one will be left behind. Among the goals that we want to achieve, the fair wage for all is a priority. We also wish to strengthen protection for self-employment and the spread of new technologies, with particular regard to smart working to support conciliation between work and private life. But we think that, above all, it is necessary to introduce specific measures to support our citizens facing poverty, unemployment or underemployment, with the provision of a basic income. What we have in mind is a social protection cum employment activation that will help people in need return to work and social life and so protect their dignity and rights. Finally, the Government of Italy intends to intensify action aimed at prevention and contrast to gender inequalities at work. We need to incentivize both good practices that avoid it and employers who remove discrimination. We need to support maternity with financial help to the families and incentives for the companies that give work to mothers after the birth of their children. It is also important to improve social infrastructures and social educational services. In this context, the fight against gender violence and harassment to workers is of paramount importance for us. We are strongly committed to ending them. We will continue to support the adoption of international labour standards that will guide us in achieving this fundamental human right objective and the work of ILO constituents at this 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are particularly glad that consciousness at national and international levels is growing on the need to fight together consistently with the objectives and targets of Agenda 2030. Thank you very much ladies and gentlemen.

Government (Somalia)

Mr President, Ministers, delegates, observers, ladies and gentlemen, let me first start in congratulating you and your Bureau for the election as President of the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference and commend the previous Bureau for the outstanding work they did during their office period. Mr President, the Federal Republic of Somalia reaffirms its obligations and continued participation as a member of ILO and ILO's agenda in pursuit of universal social justice and lasting peace in the world of work. As ILO's work for gender equality enters its second century, and with it its continuous long commitment record, we are still a long way to reaching the fair world of work for women with low progress, as indicated to the report of the Director-General. Numerous studies have shown women are one of the most powerful investments we can make in building a better future. Somali women are among them. They did not spare any effort to contribute to the future of their country from independence until today. As a country in the world, we need to move with a greater sense of urgency in addressing the gender pay gap. It is the injustice for our time. We must double our efforts to reverse these imbalances and fulfil the universal suffrage of equal pay for equal work. In the context of Somalia, women business associations and networks have great potential to become sustainable institutions that support and strengthen, enabling an environment for the economic advancement of women. Mr President, we know that violence against women leads to losses in productivity and well-being, impacting the national budget, people's lives and overall development. We should put our efforts together to protect women and girls. The Somali Provisional Constitution provides for protection from discrimination in the workplace and from violence against women, including sexual abuses. The Independent Human Rights Commission selected candidates, with four women and one disabled, is in the process of approval. Mr President, the underlying strategic objective of the ILO suggests the right to decent employment and income opportunity for women and men and the guarantee for social protection is key to the spirit and product of state building and sustainable development of my country. With the support of ILO, we have devolved the first ever employment strategy of Somalia in the draft form to seek additional feedback from federal member States and stakeholders to further tackle unemployment, job creation and poverty reduction for our citizens, specifically for youth and women. In terms of civil servant reform processes, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs is in the process of completing the HR audit that focuses on ensuring identification of both strengths and weaknesses of public administration officers in aligning the national development plan and strategic policy of this issue. The Ministry is also leading the process for the review of labour laws, as well as developing National Employment Strategy with the public and private sector. Mr President, ILO's strong core mandate on Goal 8 of the 2030 Agenda positions the ILO in a crucial role in the world's quest to end global poverty. Indeed, as unemployment is a major obstacle to strengthening the citizens' purchasing power and their way out of poverty, this has pushed many of our youth to make the dangerous journey across the Mediterranean where lives are needlessly lost or attracted to be recruited by terrorist groups. The Somali Government is committed towards peace and economic development in the country. As one of the least developed countries, and being severely affected by conflict and natural disaster, Somalia is at a critical stage in laying the foundation and the persuasions needed to realize the 2030 goal in particular. We urge the ILO in assisting Somalia in establishing programmes targeting job creation for the youth. We are indeed a country where more than 70 per cent of the population is youth. Human trafficking will therefore come at the cost of our productivity and creativity. Mr President, Somalia places great importance on social dialogue. It is more than just an abstract notion, but an instrument which is a means to an end in achieving the global goals we have set out to pursue. Indeed, the detailed objective of Somali Compact, endorsed by the Federal Government of Somalia and our international partners, rests upon works to build, strengthen, promote and lastly respect the fundamental convention of ILO. We would like to thank ILO's Decent Work Programme's efforts in Somalia which have been transformative and have aided the Government and social partners to make real progress towards peace and state-building goals. In conclusion, in order to face the challenges we are experiencing, it is important that the international community continues to support Somalia at what is a crucial juncture so that peace, stability and decent work efforts do not lose momentum. I thank you Mr Chairman.

Ms Francisco

Worker (Angola)

President of the Conference, ladies and gentlemen, it is a great honour and indeed a privilege to take the floor in this august tripartite assembly on behalf of the men and women workers of Angola. I would like to begin by first of all congratulating the Director-General for having chosen for the debates of this conference such an important issue for the world of work, specifically the Women at Work initiative. I would also like to congratulate the Chairperson of the Governing Body for his report on the period of 2017 to 2018. Now we have this concept of gender, of fairness, and equality in the world of work, and that is to be discussed here in the run-up to the centenary, is a unique opportunity which can serve as a catalyst to try and reinforce our tripartite efforts at the national level to try and promote fairer and more egalitarian societies. Violence and harassment in the world at work are some of the most visible forms of non-respect for human rights, and for this reason this discussion of these issues is of the utmost importance. Your Excellencies, non-discrimination and the promotion of equality have always been fundamental rights in the Republic of Angola. Since the 1970s, Angolans have been concerned with economic and political emancipation and trying to combat different social stereotypes. The efforts of the State to try and promote gender equality and also the role played by the women's committees of unions has been very, very important as we try to move and break with preconceived notions as we have seen a massive wave of women join the labour market over the last years. We see that women have moved forward in the area of gender equality over this period of the last decades, but the achievements of women in Angola, we should point out the following. First of all the constitutional call for no gender discrimination and gender equality within our Constitution and that there be no discrimination based upon origin, race, party politics, sex, colour, or any other form of discrimination. The approval of Law 25/11 against domestic violence provides a text which can be used to try and combat domestic violence. And also we have the approval of Presidential Decree 8/11 which defines different rights for family benefits, for nursing benefit and other areas to try and help with subsidy for maternity and pre-maternity. We have then also had a national law put forward which is being discussed by unions to try and combat sexual harassment and other problems in the workplace. Now, according to the statistics, there are more women in the world than men and yet, despite the fact that women are in the majority, stereotypes continue to force women into second-place positions in societies, and in particular in labour markets. In Angola, for example, most Angolan women work in the informal sector and in caregiving roles, and for that reason they are working in precarious jobs and not earning much, and have little social protection. Ladies and gentlemen, the Angolan society over these last months has seen major economic, social and political changes which have affected workers in general and in particular women. Prices are high for food and other goods. It makes it impossible for people, with the salaries they earn, to actually get the things they need if they are going to meet their families' needs. The tripartite organs which have been created in the country don't work very regularly, and have not been useful in trying to discuss the labour problems. Beyond the different economic and social problems that workers face, over 64,000 public servants have not been paid since the month of April. There is no legal justification for this, violating the very underpinnings of human rights and human dignity, and indeed over a million people are not having the financial means available for their basic subsistence needs. A basic general labour law a couple of years ago led to more layoffs, more unemployment, less security and less health in the workplace, and indeed, in a nutshell, more precarity. We need to try and do what we can to try and find a better way to balance our work lives and professional lives and to make it easier for women to join the workforce, and we need to make sure that we can ease the path into the job market. We see that we have had the traditional, old-fashioned approach where men feel that they are superior and would not deign to help in the family or help with the family responsibilities. In most countries in Africa, most of the caregiving is performed by women, which makes it harder for women to join the formal labour market, and quite often it means that women are often seen as not being very reliable employees because of their many responsibilities. If we can't get the balance right between family life and working life, if we can't find a way to do this at the national level and international level, then we are going to have a great deal of problems. We are going to see that the informal sector will be where women work and only there. [vgr INTERRUPTION 6:34] I just wanted to speak on behalf of the rights of the 64 state public servants who are not having their rights respected, so I would like to take up their call for justice.

Ms Horváth

Government (Hungary)

Mr Chairperson, let me congratulate you on behalf of the Hungarian Government, to all officers of this year's conference and their excellent job in running the sessions of the ILC. I would like to thank the Director-General for the excellent report on The Women at Work Initiative. We are particularly glad that this important topic is at the heart of our discussions this year. The Hungarian Government fully supports the view that gender equality is one of the main pillars for achieving global social justice. Furthermore, in this context, I would like to express our appreciation for the global efforts led by the ILO to meet the ambitious commitments of the 2030 Agenda. Hungary strongly believes that the goals of the Women at Work initiative can and should be achieved. We simply cannot allow sitting idly by, watching the enormous inequalities among us and the negative effects they impose on the world of work. Therefore, we are committed to the efforts of ILO in this domain, as we are preparing to celebrate the centenary of ILO. One of the main priorities of the Hungarian Government is to improve the responsiveness of the labour market by promoting job creation and employability through stimulating both the supply and the demand side of the labour market. As part of our efforts, we have elaborated several strategies and implemented action plans for facilitating gender equality in the world of work. The basic guiding principle of these policies is that reaching social justice is not possible without providing decent jobs and working conditions for women and men. The Government also recognizes the importance of the balance between family and work. Therefore, a number of programmes and campaigns have been started, such as the Year of Families 2018. A wide range of subsidies are provided for families, like the Child Care Allowance Plus Programme, which makes it possible for women to rejoin the labour market six months after giving birth and still be entitled to receive childcare allowance. As a result of the measures taken by the Government of Hungary, the number of employed women in the country has risen substantially, regardless of age or qualification. Furthermore, we are proud to report that the rate of women's unemployment has fallen below the 5 per cent threshold. It needs to be emphasized that social partners are also essential in raising awareness and understanding the benefits of gender equality and creation of decent jobs. We must acknowledge that the commitment of all stakeholders is pivotal for adequate implementation of the aforementioned strategies, action plans and programmes. Concerning the future, Hungary considers that the promotion of decent work for all and upholding fundamental rights at work are imperishable objectives and have to remain at the heart of all ILO's activities. On behalf of the Hungarian Government, I would like to reassure the Director-General about our commitment to support the work of ILO in general and the Women at Work initiative in particular. We are looking forward to participating in ILO's deliberations and invaluable work that leads towards the achievement of our shared goals. Thank you for your attention.

Government (Guinea)

Mr President, Director-General, distinguished delegates. At the outset, it is my pleasure to convey to you the warm greetings of Professor Alpha Condé, the President of the Republic of Guinea. He, as do I, wishes you every success in the course of this 107th Session of the ILC. I would also like to commend Mr Samir Murad, the Minister of Labour of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, for his election to preside over the work of the 107th International Labour Conference. My delegation wishes to reassure him of its full cooperation in his work. President, my delegation is delighted to be able to participate in this global meeting which, given its tripartite nature, allows us to reflect on the ways and means to address the challenges facing the world of work in an international context characterized by economic and political shocks against a backdrop of migratory crises and environmental degradation. Our organization, which will be marking its centenary in 2019 has, since it was founded, spared no effort in its effort to promote decent work and social justice towards a fairer world. The items on the agenda for this conference session do contribute, to a great extent, to improving labour governance. Guinea would commend the Chairperson of the Governing Body and the ILO Director-General for their exhaustive reports. It goes without saying that the implementation of the Sustainable Development Goals will further improve the wellbeing of populations whilst reducing inequality through effective cooperation that can enable resources to be mobilized. With this in mind, Guinea has taken steps towards improved ownership of Agenda 2030 with the 17 goals being disseminated to the population on an ongoing basis. My delegation remains deeply concerned by the phenomenon of violence and sexual harassment, which needs to be dealt with in a holistic way through relevant national policymaking to protect women as well as fostering equality and non-discrimination in terms of gender issues and migration. Guinea has established an institutional legal and regulatory framework to combat these degrading phenomena. As part of labour governance, my country has set up a national committee for social dialogue which allows us to prevent and to address conflict. This committee played a noteworthy role in the positive outcome from the most recent strike action by the Free Union of Teachers in Guinea in January and February 2018. My country wishes to renew its attachment to the ideals of peace and justice and launches a call to end discrimination, oppression and harassment in the workplace against men and women, and to ensure that all workers may flourish in sustainable development. Lastly, my delegation reaffirms its steadfast commitment to the cause of the Palestinian people. I thank you.

Ms Rwanyindo Kayirangwa

Government (Rwanda)

Mr President, distinguished delegates, on behalf of the Government of Rwanda, my delegation wishes to start by congratulating Honourable Minister Samir Murad for his election as President of this session. I commend both the President of the Governing Body and the Director-General for the report they have presented to us, where areas requiring more efforts were highlighted for our urgent focus. I also would like to thank each and everyone here present for the work we are doing, all of us together, to promote employment and decent work. Our delegation further commends the Governing Body for having included on the agenda a standard setting item on violence against women and men in the world of work. Mr President, distinguished delegates, Rwanda has made efforts to prevent and eliminate all forms of discrimination and violence in the world of work. We have pursued zero tolerance efforts on gender-based violence and discrimination. Victims of violence in the world of work must be protected and receive psychosocial, medical, police and legal services. In the case of Rwanda, we have established ISANGE One Stop Centres to enhance prevention and provide treatment services to the victims of gender-based violence, including any cases of violence and gender-based discrimination that may occur in the workplace. In the context of social protection, a national maternity insurance scheme was approved in 2015 and is implemented in public and private sectors. It has helped ensure job security for both pregnant and breastfeeding women and allows them to continue receiving their full salary during the maternity leave. The maternity insurance scheme also allowed mothers to have enough time to take care of their young kids, contributing to early child development critical to sustainable, productive adulthood. Rwanda has a strong political will to promote gender equity and equality in all spheres of life, including at the workplace. Currently, 64 per cent of Rwandan parliamentarians are women, and women representation in other sectors has also been increasing. In 2015, the Government of Rwanda, in collaboration with all social partners, adopted the Five Year Decent Work Country program, which is built upon promoting employment for women and youth, extension of social protection to all, promotion of tripartite social dialogue and promotion of rights at work. With a view to creating decent and productive jobs, Rwanda has set a target of creating 1.5 million productive jobs by 2024 under our National Strategy for Transformation. Employment trends are now measured through a Bi-Annual Labour Force Survey that helps avail labour and employment statistics to inform evidence-based policy actions. Under the leadership of His Excellency Paul Kagame, the President of the Republic of Rwanda, the Government of Rwanda is committed to promoting, protecting and ensuring full respect of all fundamental principles and rights at work. Concerning prevention and elimination of violence and harassment in the world of work, Rwanda aligns itself with the proposal of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. In the regional and global context, Rwanda is open to free movement of labour and workers, and firmly believes in the benefit of labour migration. And beyond the labour migration context, you are all welcome to visit Rwanda. Concluding, I would like to reiterate our expectation that the new ILO Centenary Initiatives and Future of Work will continue to devote special attention to the needs of women and youth in terms of employable skills, and national policies conducive to creation of productive and decent jobs. Thank you all for your kind attention.

Mr Bacale Obiang

Government (Equatorial Guinea)

President, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen. The Constitution of my country regards work to be a right and an obligation of any citizen resident in the country of Equatorial Guinea. Equatorial Guinea has been a member of the ILO since 1981 and at all times has done everything possible to facilitate the exercise of this right and delegation, which are anchored in the Constitution, and to do so in optimal conditions, despite the very many difficulties that derive from our short experience and the profile of our society. And these are obstacles that we have managed to overcome with the support of the ILO. The Director-General of the ILO in his report covering 2016-17 gives what we feel to be an accurate snapshot of the situation of social justice around the world. The report highlights some of the success stories that have been achieved by the member States during the two year period, and it also refers to the development, implementation and evaluation of the strategic goals of the ILO, and obviously all of this working towards consolidating the global Decent Work Programme. Employment, social protection, social tripartism are the fundamental principles and rights, questions which are vital in the global context, and obviously these have directed a lot of interest on the part of our governments. And we see that at the time we are going through a global economic crisis and the negative effects of this crisis have had an impact on the socio-labour sphere. The report highlights that there will be 192.7 million unemployed people around the world, including citizens from Equatorial Guinea. Our country has seen very high levels of unemployment since the drop in the crude oil price, which was the main source of revenue for our country, and also with the finalization of infrastructure work, which all forms a part of the first part of a national plan for economic and social development in our country, Horizon 2020, which was developed by the Government. The adverse situation has led to very many young people being affected by unemployment, which is a phenomenon which is undermining and has exacerbated some of the shortcomings relating to relations on our labour market. And in this sense, the Director-General's report has also said that there are 4,000 million people around the world without adequate social protection, including citizens from our country, and obviously this does constitute a challenge for us. In this field, the Government has decided to optimize social protection cover, and to this end, has submitted a draft social protection law which is currently being discussed with a view to its adoption. And in this way, we should be able to face up to all the challenges. We would like to express our gratitude here, and say that we count on the support of the ILO, and we are currently working on developing and implementing a Decent Work Country Programme, and the activities related to this are going forward at a good pace. And we have identified the three priorities which characterize our Decent Work Country

---

Programme, that is employment for young people and women, social protection and labour standards. With this Decent Work Country Programme in Equatorial Guinea, what my Government aims to do, amongst other things, is to reduce the informal economy, improve protection for women and young people, and also promote self-employment. In a specific way, what Equatorial Guinea is trying to do is promote tripartism on the basis of a structure which will allow participation of all social actors, guaranteeing direct, realistic and sincere social dialogue. The Government is very much willing to count on the participation of representatives of the workers, and in order to do this they are pushing the reform of the current law which regulates freedom of association and trade union freedom. This is a law that was adopted 26 years ago, and obviously it is essential now that we proceed to its reform in order to be able to adapt to the new times and to better guarantee participation of workers in social dialogue. We therefore wish to continue to count on the guiding voice of the ILO because we need the support of the ILO on our path towards improving and consolidating relations on the labour market and tripartite dialogue, and obviously that support will be very much valued. The Ministry for Labour, Job Promotion and Social Security and its Minister addressing you today obviously places its full trust in the current good relations with the ILO, which have always existed right from the outset. In order to conclude, I would like to point out that Equatorial Guinea, with President Obiang Nguema Mbasogo at its head, has been enjoying a very long period of political stability, which is one of the factors that favours a climate for negotiation and foreign investment. We live in peace in our country, and this can be seen through the very high level of hospitality which we share with other countries represented here. Another important factor is the youth and the characteristics of our people, always willing to grow professionally and to explore new experiences in the world of work. Honourable delegates, I would just like to say that when I go back to my country, in my luggage I will be carrying the hope of my country, both in terms of bilateral relations and multilateral relations, and hopefully to be able to count on the support of all of you in order to achieve the goals we have set ourselves. Thank you.

Mr Hothnyang

Government (South Sudan)

Thank you, Mr President. Honourable Ministers, the Director-General of the ILO, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of South Sudan, and on my behalf, I would like to avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate you, Mr President, for having been elected the President of the current 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. Our congratulations are also due to the Vice-President of the Conference. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General, Mr Guy Ryder, and his staff for the excellent organization of this important annual event and the warm welcome accorded to our delegation. On the other hand, we would like to commend the very comprehensive and informative report that Mr Guy Ryder presented during the opening session of the conference. We are in agreement with what the Director-General said in his report about the vital need for dialogue to improve the working relations, the importance of collective bargaining, and zero tolerance violence and harassment in the workplace. In this regard, and to realize some of these objectives, I am privileged to announce to this plenary that South Sudan has successfully enacted its labour bill into law. It was passed by the Transitional National Legislative Assembly in November 2017, and it was assented by the President on 12 December 2017. The labour law observes the importance of the working relationship, including the rights of the workers, and it embodies for provision for the regulation of working relations between the various stakeholders, as well as the protection of workers without discrimination, and especially of the women. Since its independence in July 2011, the Republic of South Sudan has adopted seven Conventions of the International Labour Organization. These Conventions were ratified when we were one Sudan, before independence. In addition to these Conventions, South Sudan signed a Memorandum of Understanding with the ILO. This Memorandum allowed the presence of ILO in South Sudan. The ILO Office in Juba, by then provided the necessary technical assistance which led, among other things, to the drafting of the Labour Bill, designing of the regulatory framework, combating child labour, drafting of the vocational training policies, developing capacity of workers and strengthening labour administrative systems. Mr President, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, the Republic of South Sudan commends the ILO for its contribution in the implementation of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, to eradicate poverty and achieve sustainable development. However, for the Government of the Republic of South Sudan, and the social partners to contribute positively in the efforts regarding the implementation of the Sustainable Development Goals, I would like to reiterate on behalf of our Government that the ILO resumes its vital activities in the country. The presence of the ILO in the country shall assist us in printing and wider dissemination of the labour law that has been enacted into law by the President. Regulations for the labour law need to be drawn in order to facilitate the implementation of the law. It shall also assist us in polishing the drafted National Social Insurance Bill, which will be presented to the Council of Ministers and to the Parliament. The purpose of this bill is to meet the pension needs of the private sector and the NGOs. Meeting the financial needs of the private sector and the NGOs is not the only challenge that the country is facing. The country is also facing a lot of difficulties in reporting about the adopted ILO Conventions, despite its commitment and willingness to comply with all the ILO reporting requirements. Thus, the provision of technical assistance and capacity building for the Government and its social partners by ILO is paramount. This has contributed positively to the fulfilment of all the requirements of the ILO, reporting and adhering to the deadline. Mr President, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, another challenge that the Transitional Government of National Unity is facing is the issue of peace in the country. The Government is currently implementing the August 2015 Agreement and pursuing the revitalization of the same agreement in order to bring lasting peace to the country. This shall in turn enhance the development and improve the livelihood of the population of the whole country. In conclusion, together we look forward to a continued partnership with the ILO in improving labour performance in the Republic of South Sudan. I thank you, Mr President. God bless you and bless the Republic of South Sudan.

Mr Konkolewsky

International Social Security Association

Honourable Vice-President of the International Labour Conference, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of Doctor Breuer, President of the International Social Security Association, the ISSA, it is my great pleasure to convey to all delegates to the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference the greetings of the ISSA and its membership of 320 government departments and social security institutions from 153 countries. First, I would like to extend my congratulations to the ILO Director-General on his report, The Women at Work

Initiative: The Push for Equality, which stresses the need to supplement existing policy instruments for the promotion of equality with new and innovative approaches. There is indeed a need to go beyond business as usual, as highlighted by the Director-General, and intensify efforts to make real progress. Importantly, this is also a condition for achieving the global commitments for 2030 and for addressing the area in which our vision of social justice is probably most challenged by the reality of grave inequalities. Having also defined inequalities, and in particular gender inequalities, as one of the main challenges for social security, the International Social Security Association and its global membership are very supportive of the leadership role that the ILO takes in the global debate on gender equality in the world of work. Poorly designed social security systems risk to perpetuate labour market inequalities by mirroring pay gap or unpaid care periods in lower levels of protection for women. As experiences from amongst other Scandinavian countries demonstrate, social security systems can do a lot of good if they are gender sensitive and are designed to compensate for inequalities in pay and work. Parental leave systems for both mothers and fathers, pension credits and other redistributive mechanisms that help reduce the pension pay gap can act to empower women and promote a fairer sharing of responsibilities between women and men, and consequently improve balance between family and work life. In addition, we must ensure that not only social security policies are designed to promote gender equality but also that delivery systems enable effective access of women to coverage and benefits. For instance, the significantly lower access of women to financial services and bank accounts must be reflected in the design of benefit delivery systems by social security institutions. The ISSA and its global membership are therefore committed to using all opportunities, in partnership with the ILO, to develop and promote innovative solutions to realize the positive impact of gender sensitive social security policies and delivery systems for promoting gender equality and empowerment of women in society. Compiling and sharing such innovations is one of the pillars of our work, for instance through our reports on key challenges for social security or our regional and global events. Using gender mainstreaming as a tool to ensure the gender sensitivity of ISSA guidelines, which are global professional standards for governance, service delivery and management of social security, is another important new measure that expresses our commitment. Clearly, these efforts must be closely interconnected with activities to address other key developments in the world of work, including in particular emerging new social needs for care in ageing societies as well as the evolving nature of work as part of the digital economy. Ladies and gentlemen, as highlighted by the Director-General, both holistic and innovative approaches are needed to address gender equality and inequalities. Having closely collaborated for more than 90 years, the ISSA is once again at the side of the ILO to promote a new push for gender equality through its unique global network of social security government departments and institutions, and as the ILO enters its centenary, we look forward to this collaboration to tackle one of the oldest and most persisting challenges to social justice. Thank you very much.

Mr Ozkan

IndustriALL Global Union

Distinguished Chair, delegates, I am speaking here on behalf of IndustriALL Global Union, representing more than 50 million workers in mining, energy and manufacturing sectors throughout the world. We consider it very important that this ILC discusses the effective development cooperation of the ILO in support of the Sustainable Development Goals. The 17 inspiring and ambitious goals address everything from poverty and hunger to equality, clean energy, climate action, decent work and economic growth and peace and justice. Indeed, the goals are interlinked and very ambitious. This is the nature of sustainability and integration of social, economic and environmental needs and solutions. Surely the time is now to recruit every individual, every institution, every movement and every force that cares about a sustainable future, the only future worth imagining, to the task of achieving them. The IndustriALL Global Union supports this effort. We do not think they are unreachable. The resources needed to attain them are in plain view. We believe we can change the world for the better. What is needed is a plan. We agree with those analysts who predict that many greener, more sustainable jobs will be created in the coming transformation. However, it cannot be disputed that there will also be job losses and job disruption. What will we say to those workers? Shall we simply tell them that they must sacrifice their lives or at least their jobs, their families and their communities for the greater good? The only morally defensible answer is to guarantee them a just transition. If we want them to support this urgently needed transformation, there must be something in it for them. If we want them to stop what they are doing today, we must be able to tell them what they will be doing tomorrow, and it had better sound good to them. No one will support a transition to a pessimistic future. No one will support an unjust transition. Therefore, programmes to ensure a just transition are not optional, they are the necessary prerequisites, the essential bridge to a sustainable future, and workers must be fully involved along with employers and governments in shaping it. Altogether we need to be able to build a future that both today's and tomorrow's workers can look forward to. Altogether we need to be able to build a future that we need not apologize to our children for. Distinguished Chair, another important item that this conference discusses is the future of work, and as manufacturing, energy and mineworkers, we already strongly feel the impacts of digitalization and so-called Industry 4.0, the label for a variety of advances in disruptive production technologies in our industries and our employment. Industry 4.0 is undoubtedly a huge transformation that will hit sectors and regions. And today, trade unions are more important than ever as we face a new and drastic industrial transformation. They are crucial players to manage the socio-economic and political changes. As the digitization of the workplace progresses, several points must be won: the right to information and consultation rights by workers' representatives at the local, regional, national, international levels; the right to education and training; the right to defined levels of privacy at work and at home. These points are not unrelated to the points I made earlier but need to ensure a just transition for workers. Chair, there is an important debate here at this conference on social dialogue and tripartism under the follow-up of ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization. Social dialogue requires full respect and implementation of fundamental rights at work. However, with a great regret and outrage we observe an increasing trend of violation of workers' rights in every corner of the world. During this ILC, there were some painful cases on the agenda of the Committee of Application of Standards. The civil coup in Brazil is now proceeding with the dismantling of workers' rights in the country. Even though it was not on the agenda, but legal strikes continue to be banned in Turkey over so-called grounds of national security. In Ukraine, deadly accidents in the mining sector make it the most dangerous sector to work in the country. Likewise, we regularly receive fatal accident news from the mining industry in Pakistan, an environment where workers cannot enjoy the fundamental rights. In Belarus, since August last year there is an obvious increasing move to eliminate independent trade unions through the false criminalization of their activities. In Algeria, Mr Chair, independent unions are subjected to terrible repression campaigns by bringing union members to court, penalizing union officials with fabricated cases. So this list is longer with the cases in other countries. This must come to an end. The world can't continue like this. If this is the place where joint commitments are made by all the constituencies to achieve progress and social justice in the world, then these violations of labour and human rights must be stopped immediately. We need to promote decent work through coordinated approach ...[vgr INTERRUPTION 6:07] ... respecting fundamental principles and rights at the work. As the manufacturing, energy and mine workers of the world, we reaffirm our commitment. We expect and demand the same from the governments and employers. Thank you very much.

Mr Celi Vegas

Exchange and Cooperation Centre for Latin America

Ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of the Exchange and Cooperation Centre for Latin America, an NGO with a consultative status with the ECOSOC and with UNCTAD and with WIPO, I would like to warmly congratulate the organizers of this the 107th Session of the ILC. The Report of the Director-General, ensuring decent working time for the future has shown the basis of much of the work of the ILO, particularly those Conventions which involve working hours, annual leave, weekly rest, night work and part-time work, and paid annual leave. These involve nine Conventions, a Protocol 6 Recommendation is to protect the rights of workers, and the idea is to try and make sure that labour is not exploited in vulnerable sectors and to protect workers who have no particular skills and also those under working age. In the modern society, we have seen that much has changed in the world of work as different technologies have come to the fore. Transformations have really changed the way that we conceive working time, and this is something which has had an impact on the economic actors and also those who manage the working rights, the governments namely. Traditional work has changed a lot, and we have seen that the relations of work have changed. We have seen telework, different platforms for working together with others, delocalization and the gig economy. In a nutshell, all of these different changes have meant that the traditional work has been much evolved, and we have seen that the labour market is in constant evolution, and we now see that we need to see new relations between the different parties to the world of work. In this context, work today is something that makes it very difficult to establish a border between the private life and working life. Days of work go on without limit, and dedication to work means that you don't actually take any rest time, and quite often we see that there is not proper respect for the basic standards which have been set by ILO Conventions. And if we are going to really try and do something about this, we have got to find a way to try and come up with new strategies so that we can make sure that work is properly paid and respects human working conditions. Ladies and gentlemen, so these are very major challenges, and most of the States have a very important role to play here. They must respect the rights of workers and make sure that those rights are defended. Ratification of the ILO instruments should be one of the major concerns of member States. We would see that this would involve making sure that we do twin human rights with workers' rights. On the employers' side, if you look at the Director-General's report, the International Organisation of Employers stresses the slowness of States when it comes to ratifying the essential Conventions. I am thinking here of Convention 1, hours of work in the industrial sector, and Convention 30, hours of work for commerce and offices, that from 1930. Only 25 per cent and 13 per cent of member States respectively have ratified these two ILO Conventions. In the same report, you'll see that the International Trade Union Confederation says that we need to have tripartite discussions which are open ended as to how to update working time gaps to the new conditions so that we can actually provide protection to workers and make sure that we do establish and respect the work-life balance for our workers. In this light, the negotiation and social dialogue mechanisms have to be essential to ensure that there is proper legal protection for workers. Ladies and gentlemen, the different Latin American governments have shown that there are strategies that can be implemented to make sure that we do address the changes in the labour market. Let me give you a couple of examples. In Brazil, for example, work on Sundays in commercial activities has to comply with municipal regulations. There has to be a day off, which would fall on a Sunday, at least once every three weeks. In Uruguay, there can be cases, where justified, where the executive is allowed in certain sectors, certain areas, certain businesses to keep shops open on Saturdays up until 1 p.m. and then on Sundays up until 9 p.m. These are examples of how we can adapt national standards to the international standards which have been approved by the ILO. That said, we are going to have lots of question marks, and we have seen often governments are not doing enough as the labour markets are going through these transformations. That is where NGOs have a role to play. They can play the role of catalysers to try and ensure that changes are made in different sectors and different contexts, where governments are not able to directly intervene. Thank you.

---

Mr Thiry

World Union of Professions

Ladies and gentlemen, at the outset I wish to commend Mr Samir Murad for his election to preside over the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference. I also thank the presidency of the conference and the Director-General of the International Labour Office for the warm welcome they extend to the World Union of Professions year in year out. As the organization prepares to mark its centenary, we must admire the huge amounts of work already carried out, but we are astonished further at the fact that the organization is always looking forward, dealing head on with the problems that remain in the world of work, despite the progress achieved thus far. That the organization is setting itself objectives stands testament to its vitality, whilst also demonstrating the visionary spirit of those who lead it. The Union shares the concerns expressed by the DG of the ILO as to the new and serious difficulties with engaging social dialogue in various parts of the world, which further lead to stigmatization and potential challenging of international cooperation in the multilateral arena. The World Union of Professions considers also that social dialogue is worthy of recurrent discussion and that every organization can, on a permanent footing at its respective levels, be involved in this. Further, the Union of Professions is convinced that to call into question international cooperation would be a grave error. Our Union, which is in essence non-governmental and international in competition will support any initiative in reaffirming and confirming the productive nature of the international system and will support any measure that might be taken to improve its functioning. The professions within the global union come from different continents and are therefore well placed to attest to the variety of real working conditions and the crucial importance of international cooperation. Liberal professions are also the nexus for aspirations within the world of work, and indeed may be a safe space for expressions of a desire to strive, individually or collectively, towards improvement of well-being, living condition of citizens, respect for human dignity, or in more precise terms, minimum standards for decent work or fulfilling work. The World Union of Professions therefore perfectly understands why emphasis should have been placed now on the need to rid the world of work of all forms of violence and harassment, be this in healthcare or in the legal profession, technical arenas, accountancy or the environment. Members of the professions are working hand in hand with people who are victims of violence and harassment, and through their professional qualifications, they see to it that the consequences of such violence can be dealt with, as well as becoming involved in preventative measures against such harassment whilst taking initiatives to raise awareness of the basic rules of respect for others. This area of concern is particularly acute today and needs particular consideration. Let us not however forget the other objectives that were set forth last year. And I am talking here about the greening of the world of work, which is of interest to all of us, workers, employers, governmental organizations and non-governmental organizations. We must act if we are all to thrive. Members of professions number in the millions worldwide, and out of conviction or idealism are contributing to the flourishing of individuals, social dialogue and development, on an individual basis or through organizations of professions, locally, regionally, nationally or internationally. Answering to lofty ethical rules, members of the professions are well placed to positively influence the implementation of these objectives. However, in certain parts of the world, members of professions themselves find themselves without protection or forced into a highly precarious situation tantamount to forced labour or with legislative amendments that lead to serious undermining of their labour conditions. You will appreciate, therefore, that I restate once again this year the willingness of the World Union of Professions to cooperate with the ILO in all areas that will allow tangible improvements in working conditions. We are convinced that, beyond the centenary celebrations, we will all agree that if we flourish at work, the world flourishes. I thank you for your attention.

Mr Mohamed

Government (Maldives)

Mr Chair, I congratulate you on your election as the Chair of the 107th International Labour Conference. Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen, it is an honour for me to address this august gathering, and I would like to send well wishes to all the delegates present here. The Government of Maldives welcomes the Director-General's report on The Women at Work Initiative and would like to take this opportunity to share our views to the report. We believe that this is an important topic to be addressed and deliberated this year. The Government of Maldives places very high importance to empower women economically and socially. Towards this end, the Government has taken a number of positive steps and measures to create a more conducive environment to address the gender gaps in the country and to enable more women participation in all the sectors of the workforce. I would like to proudly announce that about 60.7 per cent of the civil service staff is women. Honourable Chair, allow me to share with you some of the key important steps that the administration of President Abdulla Yameen has undertaken in this regard. On the legislative front, in 2017, the Government for the first time introduced the Gender Equality Act. This act establishes a framework to ensure gender equality and eliminate gender-based discrimination, gender-based violence, as well as sexual harassment in the workplace within the country. It further outlines the role of the Government and other agencies to help ensure the successful implementation of the act. The Government of Maldives, under the Ministry of Gender and Family, has been spearheading the implementation of the act. Apart from the Gender Equality Law in 2014, the Government has elected a Sexual Harassment Act and Sexual Offence Act. The introduction of these important pieces of legislation in the early part of the administration of President Yameen is a clear testament to the importance that the government places on promoting women in the workplace, ensuring their rights are protected and that enabling framework is put in place to bridge gender gaps and promote gender equality. Mr Chair, to effectively implement these important pieces of legislation, the Government of Maldives has been taking a number of initiatives to ensure benefits flow to women in the workforce. To recognize women for their valuable contribution to the development of Maldives, the Ministry of Gender and Family in 2014 has introduced a special annual award by the name of Rehendhi Award. This has been an initiative to further encourage women to engage and contribute to the society and overall growth of the country and added impetus to bring positive changes in the lives of women. In addition, the Government has ongoing development projects aimed at promoting and strengthening the livelihoods of home-based women workers. The objective of these ongoing development initiatives is to facilitate women entrepreneurs of small businesses to market their commodities. Further, to target women working in the informal economy under the Government's SME initiative, dedicated loan facilities are provided to foster women to take up entrepreneurial activities and assist them in setting up their own businesses. In fact, 40 per cent of all government run SME loan facilities are earmarked for women and youth. The Government also places importance in assisting women to eliminate the gender gaps in the corporate sector. To this end, in corporate boards of state-owned enterprises, women representation is now on the rise. On the social front, Maldives ensures equal opportunity for a girl child to get a proper education. Education is free for both genders up to 12th grade. Most recently, university statistics reveal that more women are graduating from the education system. Universal healthcare is provided to all Maldivian irrespective of gender. Pension benefits are available to both genders, and old age retirement pensions are made available for 65 and above, irrespective of gender. Mr Chair, to promote gender diversity and increase the role of women in the workplace, the Government has been undertaking a number of initiatives. Mr Chair, the Government of Maldives is fully committed to promoting gender diversity and equality in the workplace. Thank you.

Government (Afghanistan)

Thank you Mr Chair. I want to exercise my Government's right of reply in response to the allegations made by the respected worker's delegate concerning two issues. One, the state properties under dispute which he mentioned and referred to, and two, the need for democratic elections of the worker's union through the workers' congress, which he did not mention in his statement. Mr Chair, the Government's recent decision to temporarily suspend the license of the workers' union is part of the broader land reform, anti-corruption, labour rights and democracy promotion goals of the Government. The action to vacate the disputed lands was a response to reports of the state land being illegally used for commercial purposes. This decision was not made by the President only but was based on two previous Cabinet decisions which the workers' union has continued to disregard. The lands are temporarily quarantined, not seized. The lands will be returned to the rightful owners or entities following the completion of the legal procedures. The allegation of unfair treatment of the workers' union members is being reviewed, and appropriate actions will be taken against individuals involved in the alleged unfair treatment of workers. The Government has categorically urged the union to convene in an expedited manner, fair and transparent elections for the leadership bodies of the workers' union, as well as the urgent need for a comprehensive assessment of the state properties under dispute. The assessment of government properties, which includes the lands used by the workers' union, is well underway. This is in our view in the interest of the nation's workers and critical for the state-building agenda. In addition, the President has issued an Order which guarantees the renewal of the workers' license, conditioned on the union's cooperation with a settlement of property disputes and the announcing of a tentative date for the election. The Ministry is working with the presidentially appointed commission to resolve these issues. We assure you of the Government's commitment to further strengthening the social dialogue and to expanding the social partners' representation in all labour and social protection agendas. We count on your support, Mr Chair, and I thank you.

Mr Petersen

Government (Brazil)

Mr Vice-President, the Brazilian Government would like to exercise its right of reply in response to allegations made by IndustriALL Global Union a few minutes ago. You, Mr Vice-President, have asked the plenary to use parliamentary language. Workers from different countries who do not know what is going on in Brazil are passing judgement on issues that do not concern them. I wish that this kind of behaviour and un-parliamentary language could stop. Once more, we call on you, Mr Vice-President, on the President, on the Vice-Presidents of this conference and the Director-General of this organization to put a stop to this kind of manifestation. It is not in accordance with the best parliamentary practices of ILO and of any UN agency for this matter. Brazil does not acknowledge any misrepresentation of legitimate processes in our country. Over the last two years, Brazil has faced political crisis and economic recession. We have implemented important economic and labour reforms, enacted key legislation and promoted positive change. Rights were not dismantled, democracy is alive, civil society is vibrant, political debate is in full force. The press continues to play its vital role in informing society and ensuring accountability. The rule of law is in place and strong. The judiciary remains fully independent. In October 2017, Brazil organized free and fair municipal elections. We are on track to hold presidential, gubernatorial and legislative elections in October later this year. Our institutions have proven their strength. By our deeds and our actions, the Government has demonstrated its unwavering commitment to the rule of law, and above all to the open and democratic character of our society. I thank you very much, Mr Vice-President.

Report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives: Submission and approval

(Original French)

Now we can move on to consider the report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives which met last Friday. The report can be found in Provisional Record No. 5A.

In paragraphs 7, 9, 12 and 14 of its report, the Finance Committee invites the Conference to take the following four decisions:

First, the Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the report along with the consolidated financial statements verified by the External Auditor for the year ending 31 December 2017.

Second, the Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the scale of contributions for the 2019 budget, as set out in Annex I of the Committee's report.

Third, the Conference is invited to renew the mandate of five of the seven judges of the ILO Administrative Tribunal for a period of three years. The five judges concerned are: Mr Giuseppe Barbagallo (Italy), Ms Fatoumata Diakité (Côte d'Ivoire), Ms Dolores Hansen (Canada), Mr Michael Moore (Australia), and Sir Hugh Rawlins (Saint Kitts and Nevis).

Finally, the Conference is called upon to appoint Mr Pierre Coutaz as alternate member of the ILO Staff Pensions Committee, with effect from now until 8 October 2019.

If there are no objections, may I take it that the Conference approves the report of the Finance Committee and the four resolutions that it contains?

(The report is approved and the four resolutions are adopted.)

A. Introduction

1. In accordance with article 7 of the Standing Orders, the Conference set up a Committee to consider and report on item III on the agenda: “Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations”. The Committee was composed of 228 members (115 Government members, eight Employer members and 105 Worker members). It also included 11 Government deputy members, 81 Employer deputy members, and 166 Worker deputy members. In addition, 33 international non-governmental organizations were represented by observers.<sup>1</sup>

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairperson: Mr Rorix Núñez Morales (Government member, Panama)

Vice-Chairpersons: Ms Sonia Regenbogen (Employer member, Canada) and Mr Marc Leemans (Worker member, Belgium)

Reporter: Mr Patrick Rochford (Government member, Ireland)

3. The Committee held 17 sittings.

4. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered: (i) the reports supplied under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution on the application of ratified Conventions; (ii) the reports requested by the Governing Body under article 19 of the Constitution on the following instruments concerning working time: the Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1); the Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14); the Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930 (No. 30); the Forty-Hour Week Convention, 1935 (No. 47); the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89); the Protocol of 1990 to the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948; the Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1957 (No. 106); the Holidays with Pay Convention (Revised), 1970 (No. 132); the Night Work Convention, 1990 (No. 171); the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (No. 175); the Night Work of Women (Agriculture) Recommendation, 1921 (No. 13); the Holidays with Pay Recommendation, 1954 (No. 98); the Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Recommendation, 1957 (No. 103); the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation, 1962 (No. 116); the Night Work Recommendation, 1990 (No. 178); and the Part-Time Work Recommendation, 1994 (No. 182); and (iii) the information supplied under article 19 of the Constitution on the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference.<sup>2</sup>

Opening sitting

5. The Chairperson said that he was honoured to preside over this Committee, which was a cornerstone of the regular supervisory system of the International Labour Organization (ILO). It was a forum for tripartite dialogue in which the Organization examined the application of international labour standards and the functioning of the supervisory system.

The conclusions adopted by the Committee and the technical work of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, together with the technical assistance of the Office, were essential tools to support member States in the implementation of the international labour standards. The Chairperson trusted that, in the course of the two-week session of the Conference, the Committee would be able to work efficiently, to respond, in a spirit of constructive dialogue, to the mandates of the Organization.

6. The Worker members emphasized that the Committee's task of supervising the application of standards served the objective of promoting social justice which lay behind the foundations of the ILO. The Worker members indicated their wish to do everything to ensure that the Committee's work had a real impact on the cases of serious violations of the international labour Conventions, which had had disastrous consequences on the economic and social situations of individuals and communities. The desired impact of the work depended as much on the Committee's working methods as on the involvement of the three groups of which it was composed, and on the Office. The conclusions adopted by the Committee were admittedly not legally binding, but enabled the greatest number of States to participate in the discussions. Those conclusions also opened up a dialogue which would have been difficult at the national level. While the Worker members were frustrated with, year after year, having to re-examine certain cases without any notable progress, they remained convinced that tripartite dialogue within the Committee offered the best guarantee for the promotion of the Organization's instruments. The Worker members hoped that all those involved would adapt their way of working with the joint objective of strengthening the mission of supervising the standards referred to the Committee and, through this fundamental mission, maintaining social peace, and combating injustices, poverty and deprivation.
7. The Employer members noted that the Conference Committee was at the centre stage of the regular ILO standards supervisory system. While the report of the Committee of Experts was the basis for the work of the Conference Committee, the members of the Conference Committee contributed to the final supervisory assessment as reflected in the conclusions, with their own legal evaluation, knowledge of latest developments and experience concerning practical, feasible and sustainable solutions. The Employer members emphasized the importance of constant and direct dialogue between the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts, not only to strengthen constituents' understanding of standards-related requirements, but also to ensure that the Committee of Experts fully grasped the realities and needs of the users of the supervisory system.
8. At the election of the Officers of the Conference Committee, the Government member of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela indicated that he did not support the candidacy of the representative of the Government of Panama for the post of Chairperson of the Committee, as it did not have the consensus of the Americas Group (GRUA). Since the Government of Panama, as a member of the Lima Group, had adopted the approach of not supporting any Venezuelan candidacy for regional and international mechanisms and organizations, his Government, in accordance with the principle of reciprocity, would not be supporting any candidacy from any countries in the Lima Group. In particular, it would not be supporting the candidacy of the Government of Panama, which should have been agreed by consensus in the plenary of GRUA, as that was a fundamental rule governing this group.
9. The Government member of Paraguay, speaking on behalf of the Group of Countries of Latin America and the Caribbean (GRULAC), indicated that the group had been leading consultations regarding the chairmanship of the Committee for several months and recalled that, in 2015, it had committed to a rotation for the functions of the Chairperson and Reporter of the Committee. In that connection, GRULAC had fulfilled its role in the coordination of formal and informal meetings.

10. The Government member of the Republic of Korea, speaking on behalf of the Government group, indicated that the group had already noted the reservations as expressed by the Government member of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, and the explanations provided by GRULAC. He explained that consultations for the nomination of the Officers of the Committee had been carried out in the Government group since January 2018, and confirmed his group's support of the nomination of the Government member of Panama as Chairperson of the Committee.
  11. The Government member of Brazil expressed full support for the candidacy of the Government member of Panama to chair the meeting of the Committee.
  12. The Government member of Mexico, echoing the information presented by the representative of GRULAC, indicated that his Government had participated in the consultations mentioned where it had supported the candidacy of the Government of Panama to the Chairperson of the Committee. He reaffirmed his support for that candidacy.

Work of the Committee

13. During its opening sitting, the Committee adopted document D.1, which set out the manner in which the work of the Committee was carried out<sup>3</sup> and, on that basis, the Committee considered its working methods, as reflected below.
14. In accordance with its usual practice, the Committee began its work with a discussion on general aspects of the application of Conventions and Recommendations and the discharge by member States of standards-related obligations under the ILO Constitution. In this general discussion, reference was made to Part One of the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. A summary of the general discussion is found under relevant headings in sections A and B of Part One of this report.
15. The Committee then examined the General Survey concerning working-time instruments. Its discussion is summarized in section C of Part One of this report.
16. Following these discussions, the Committee considered the cases of serious failure by member States to respect their reporting and other standards-related obligations. The result of the examination of these cases is contained in section D of Part One of this report. More detailed information on that discussion is contained in section A of Part Two of this report.
17. The Committee then considered 23 individual cases relating to the application of various Conventions. The examination of the individual cases was based principally on the observations contained in the Committee of Experts' report and the oral and written explanations provided by the governments concerned. As usual, the Committee also referred to its discussions in previous years, comments received from employers' and workers' organizations and, where appropriate, reports of other supervisory bodies of the ILO and other international organizations. Time restrictions once again required the Committee to select a limited number of individual cases among the Committee of Experts' observations. With reference to its examination of these cases, the Committee reiterated the importance it placed on the role of tripartite dialogue in its work and trusted that the governments of the countries selected would make every effort to take the necessary measures to fulfil their obligations under ratified Conventions. The result of the examination of these cases is contained in section D of Part One of this report. A summary of the information submitted by governments and the discussions of the examination of individual cases, as well as the conclusions adopted by the Committee, are contained in section B of Part Two of this report.

18. The adoption of the report and the closing remarks are contained in section E of Part One of this report.

Working methods of the Committee

19. Upon adoption of document D.1, the Chairperson made some announcements regarding time management, particularly the time limit for interventions made during the discussion. Recalling the obligation for delegates to abide by parliamentary language, he trusted that the shared experience would ensure the success of the Committee's work.
20. The Worker members underlined that the Committee's working methods had evolved to take account of the shortening of its work to two weeks, like that of the Conference, thereby imposing a heavy workload. Strict time management had enabled the Committee to complete its work in the time available, allaying some concerns in that regard. Certain fears raised regarding the quality of the discussions under such conditions could also be set aside through a more rigorous and concerted preparation by the groups of the Committee, which would also reinforce the relevance of the interventions. It was nevertheless necessary for everyone's voice to be heard and to contribute to the work of the Committee. The reduction in speaking time should also be marginal. Over and above these practical aspects, the work of the Committee was based on the contributions made by the Committee of Experts, Governments, the Worker and Employer members of the Committee, and the Office. The quality of the work of the Conference Committee was conditional on that of the report and the General Survey prepared by the Committee of Experts. The work of the Office was essential in the follow-up to the Committee's recommendations. In that regard, the reports of follow-up missions should be published so that everyone could be informed. Furthermore, the resources of the International Labour Standards Department of the Office should be strengthened to enable it to more structurally incorporate the follow-up to the conclusions of the Conference Committee. Governments, through their obligation to respect and ensure respect of the protection provided for in ILO instruments, had an essential role in the resolution of the failures detected, and through the sharing of experience.
21. The Employer members hoped that the views they expressed during the discussions and reflected in the conclusions of the Conference Committee would be used by the other ILO supervisory procedures of the Office in the support it provided to the supervisory bodies, as well as ILO initiatives within the context of the United Nations 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. Recalling that this was the last session of the Conference Committee before the ILO Centenary, they looked forward to constructive tripartite dialogue which reaffirmed the central role of the Conference Committee in the supervision of international labour standards. While divergences of views on substantial issues existed among constituents, and between the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts, the Employer members were committed to voicing these differences in a spirit of mutual respect and understanding, and working towards constructive outcomes.
22. The Government member of Paraguay, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, regretted that the views of this group were not reflected in document D.1 which, in his view, contained elements on which there had not been tripartite consensus, which did not help to build trust in or credibility of the supervisory system. To defend effective tripartite consensus in the Committee, it was essential to increase the participation of governments in the informal tripartite consultations on the working methods of the Committee. Lastly, the Committee should examine cases of progress, as they could act as examples of good practices for other States and would therefore have a positive impact on future ratifications.

Adoption of the list of individual cases

23. During the course of the second sitting of the Committee, the Chairperson of the Committee announced that the list of individual cases to be discussed by the Committee was available.<sup>4</sup>
24. Following the adoption of this list, the Worker members emphasized the particular importance of the adoption of the list of individual cases in the Committee's work as it was a moment which placed certain States before the failures which they refused to consider at the national level, and which were brought up in the presence of other States. This year, once again, the cases selected which related to violations of the fundamental Conventions were numerous and, once again, reflected the constant pressure placed on respect for fundamental rights at work throughout the world. While the Worker members welcomed the fact that the list of individual cases had been adopted by consensus, they regretted the inevitable disappointment generated by the list for certain Worker members who would have hoped their cases to be examined by the Committee. Although the following cases would not be discussed, the Worker members wished to refer to certain worrying situations relating to the world of work and express the hope that they would be addressed within the context of other ILO supervisory mechanisms. They included breaches of fundamental labour rights in Kazakhstan, serious violations of fundamental rights and civil liberties in Turkey, child labour in Malawi, particularly in the tobacco and tea sectors, and the situation of the labour inspection services in Pakistan. There was also the violent repression of peaceful demonstrations by workers in Bangladesh and the stark lack of progress in bringing the law and practice into conformity with the requirements of Convention No. 87, despite the repeated examination of the case by the Committee since 2000. In that respect, the Worker members would follow the development of the situation in the country until the following year and, on that basis, consider the possibility of recourse to the complaints procedure under article 26 of the ILO Constitution. They also wished to draw attention to the situation of serious failures in relation to fundamental rights at work in certain countries not on the preliminary list of cases. Those concerned violations of freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining in Argentina and Colombia, as well as in Egypt, where a recently adopted law threatened the independent trade union movement.
25. The Government member of Paraguay, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, recalled his group's position on the following points: (i) the final list of individual cases should be published earlier so that governments could prepare a satisfactory response; (ii) the most serious cases should be given priority; (iii) the Chairperson of the Committee could play a role in seeking tripartite consensus; and (iv) the governments concerned should be informed well in advance so that they could forward all the information to the competent authorities, so that they could take the necessary action. With regard to the adoption of conclusions, it was important to encourage the government concerned to communicate its views on the conclusions, including the conditions under which they would be implemented.
26. The Government member of Algeria hoped that the informal tripartite discussions on working methods that had taken place would support the decision-making process for the reform of the supervisory bodies, with a view to strengthening the role of the Committee on the Application of Standards and the relevance of its work in the discussion of individual cases. The Committee's current working methods for the selection of individual cases was the result of an evolution intended to increase relevance. However, those methods had had a perverse effect which weakened the tripartite values defended by the Organization and even the Committee's work. Recalling that his Government had put forward proposals on the informal discussions, he welcomed certain changes introduced thus far, in particular the advance communication to the Governments of the preliminary list of cases and the rigorous management of speaking times during discussions. While the selection process for individual cases had become more transparent and effective, progress remained to be made, particularly regarding the search for an adequate formula to ensure equal tripartite participation in that process. The Government group should participate, along with the Employer and Worker members, in the process of determining the selection criteria for individual cases. Furthermore, the final list of individual cases should be available before the start of the Committee, in order to allow countries included on the list to prepare their responses and provide the necessary information. Discussions on the Committee's working methods should contribute to the relevance of its work and all member States should continue in that direction.

27. The Employer member of Argentina, referring to the Worker members' statement, recalled that his country did not even appear on the preliminary list of cases and inquired as to the real reason for that reference.
28. The Government member of Argentina, referring to the Workers' statement, said that while she respected freedom of expression and opinion, she considered that the mention of her country and references to any economic agreements and legislative reforms being formulated were irrelevant to the Committee.
29. The Government member of Egypt, referring to the Worker members' statement, noted that his country did not appear on the preliminary list of individual cases. He recalled that the new legislation, referred to by the Worker members, had been subject to in-depth consultation, particularly with the ILO.

B. General questions relating to international labour standards

Statement by the representative of the Secretary-General

30. The representative of the Secretary-General recalled that the Committee on the Application of Standards was a standing Committee of the International Labour Conference which had met each year since 1926 and its mandate, which was at the heart of the ILO's activities, consisted, among other functions, of examining and bringing to the attention of the Conference meeting in plenary session: (i) the measures taken by Members to give effect to the Conventions to which they were parties; and (ii) the information and reports concerning Conventions and Recommendations communicated by Members in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution. Under the terms of this article, the Committee examined each year a General Survey on the law and practice of member States in a specific field. The details of the Committee's work were contained in document D.1, which also reported on the many improvements made to the working methods of the Committee following the informal tripartite consultations held on this subject since 2006.
31. Following the latest informal tripartite consultations held in November 2017 and March 2018, it had been agreed that the procedure for the adoption of conclusions on the cases that are examined would be modified slightly. It was now envisaged that the conclusions would be visible on screen in the language used by the Chairperson while they were being read out and that at the same time a hard copy of the conclusions would be provided to the Government representative concerned in one of the three working languages of their choice: English, French or Spanish. The Government representative concerned could take the floor, if she or he so wished, once the Chairperson had announced the adoption of the conclusions. Once again this year, in the same way as last year, the draft minutes of the meetings would be published in a trilingual “patchwork” version (English, French and Spanish). Each intervention would be reflected only in the working language in which it was made or in the language selected by the speaker when requesting the floor. The final report of the Committee, and particularly Part Two on the examination of individual cases, would be submitted to the Committee for adoption in plenary session in the same trilingual “patchwork” version, and the three fully translated versions of the report would be posted online ten days after the end of the Conference. In addition, all the Committee’s documents, including the draft minutes of the sittings, would be posted online on the Committee’s web page, which would be the main means of sharing documents, in accordance with the paperless policy implemented by the Office. Amendments to the minutes for each sitting may be submitted either in writing or by email. During the latest informal tripartite consultations, it had been decided to allocate more time for the discussion of the General Survey to permit its examination in greater depth. The members of the Committee were invited to take full advantage of the opportunity to inform the Committee of problems and national practices relating to working time in the light of the examination made by the Committee of Experts. The General Survey and the outcome of the Committee’s discussions would inform the subsequent examination by the Tripartite Working Group of the Standards Review Mechanism.

- 32. In 2018, the ILO was celebrating the 70th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87), which had both been adopted in 1948. It was also the 60th anniversary of the adoption of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention (No. 111) in 1958. Finally, 2018 was the 20th anniversary of the adoption of the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, which had been adopted in 1998. It seemed important to emphasize the interdependence and relevance of all those instruments. Moreover, the fact that the 2030 Sustainable Development Agenda, adopted by the United Nations, devoted many of its targets and indicators to equality, diversity and inclusion, as well as to the rule of law and good governance, demonstrated the importance of equality and freedom of association for the future of work and for sustainable development. Those two indissociable principles had their foundations and universal recognition in an emblematic document, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The recognition in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights that all human beings had fundamental rights and freedoms had retained all its relevance and remained essential today. That universal message had been taken up in the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, adopted in 1998, in order to emphasize, among other matters, the indissociable nature of the four fundamental principles and rights at work. Nevertheless, despite the time that had elapsed since the adoption of those two Declarations, violations of human rights, including of freedom of association and non-discrimination, were far from eradicated throughout the world. Convention No. 87 was part of the ILO’s DNA. Without Convention No. 87, it would be impossible to speak of tripartism and social dialogue. And it was often said that, without freedom of association, there could be no equality, since social dialogue and collective bargaining made a decisive contribution to promoting equality and protecting against discrimination. To date, Convention No. 87 had received 154 ratifications. Even so, it was still the least widely ratified of all of the ILO’s fundamental Conventions. The recurrent report on social dialogue, which would be discussed during the present session of the Conference, and last year’s recurrent report on fundamental principles and rights at work, both emphasized the need to further promote the ratification and implementation of the fundamental Conventions, particularly in the field of freedom of association, especially as the ILO’s Centenary drew near. Convention No. 111 had been adopted in 1958, in the middle of the period of decolonization and the historic civic movements. Today, following the adoption of the 1998 Declaration and the subsequent ratification campaign, the Convention had been ratified by 175 member States. Despite that, and the major progress achieved since the adoption of the Convention, the eradication of discrimination was far from a reality and discrimination of all types persisted on grounds of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin. That worrying situation lay behind one of the commitments of Agenda 2030 to leave no one behind.

- 33. With particular reference to women at work, according to the Director-General of the ILO, whose Report this year covered that important subject, “[t]he undeniable reality is that the disadvantages that women continue to face at work, notwithstanding the real progress that has been recorded, including through the ILO, constitute perhaps the most flagrant and the greatest offence to social justice”. It therefore seemed appropriate that the International Labour Conference was examining this year in the first discussion the adoption of a new instrument on violence and harassment at work which, as emphasized recently by the media, was unfortunately a very widespread reality in the world of work. In that regard, the Director-General called on all the members of the ILO community, and not only those who worked in the Office, but also the members of the Governing Body, experts, delegates and participants in ILO meetings and Conferences, to be aware of and to prevent any manifestation of sexual harassment or violence. It was the responsibility of everyone to ensure that the International Labour Conference offered an example in that respect.
- 34. With regard to the progress achieved within the context of the Centenary Standards Initiative, she recalled that the Standards Initiative had two components, which were both under the responsibility of the ILO Governing Body. The first component concerned the Standards Review Mechanism and its Tripartite Working Group, the object of which was to contribute to ensuring that the ILO’s body of standards was up to date and responded to the changing patterns of the world of work. In that regard, the work was progressing constructively. At its third meeting in September 2017, the Tripartite Working Group had undertaken its first substantive examination of 19 instruments on occupational safety and health (general provisions and specific risks). During its examination, the Tripartite Working Group had benefited from the outcome of the Conference Committee’s discussion of last year’s General Survey on occupational safety and health. The findings of the Tripartite Working Group included: (i) the need to promote the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187); (ii) the fact that the Prevention of Industrial Accidents Recommendation, 1929 (No. 31), was outdated and should be withdrawn; and (iii) the fact that ten instruments required further action to maintain their future relevance. Finally, the Tripartite Working Group had identified two gaps in terms of protection relating respectively to questions of ergonomics at work and biological hazards. With a view to following up the recommendations of the Tripartite Working Group, the Office had taken measures to support the development of national tripartite plans of action on international labour standards. The second component of the Standards Initiative related to the strengthening of the ILO supervisory system. Both bipartite and tripartite discussions were also progressing in that respect. At its next session, the Governing Body would examine several improvements to the supervisory system, including the extension of the reporting cycles for technical Conventions from five to six years and reinforcing the planning of requests for reports by subject.
- 35. With reference to the Office’s strategy to provide technical assistance to facilitate tangible progress at the national level, she indicated that, as a result of the implementation of two action and promotional plans, over the past two years there had been 14 ratifications of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as well as 14 ratifications of instruments on occupational safety and health. The full results of ILO action over the last two years, including in the area of international labour standards, were outlined in the Report of the Director-General on ILO programme implementation 2016–17, which was submitted to the current session of the Conference. As decided during informal tripartite consultations on the working methods of the Committee, information regarding the measures taken by the Office to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee had once again been posted on the dedicated web page and was updated regularly. In line with the conclusions and recommendations adopted last year by the Committee, a high-level tripartite mission had visited Kazakhstan; there had been two direct contacts missions to Egypt and El Salvador; a high-level mission in Mauritania; and a technical assistance mission in Belarus. Moreover, several other countries had requested and received technical assistance from the Office. The reports received from governments that had benefited from such assistance often demonstrated the extent to which the discussions and conclusions of the Committee could facilitate the provision by the Office of targeted and truly effective assistance. In cases of serious failure by member States to comply with their reporting obligations, the Office offered technical assistance tailored to their needs. Several of the member States concerned had fulfilled, at least in part, their reporting obligations. Finally, with the Turin Centre, the Office was continuing to provide tailored training on international labour standards at the national, regional and international levels. The annual International Labour Standards Academy had been held for the second time this year with a view to sharing knowledge and tools on international labour standards with the tripartite constituents of the ILO, judges, lawyers, law professors and media professionals.

36. In conclusion, the representative of the Secretary-General reaffirmed that the Office was once again determined to support and consolidate the constructive participation of the tripartite constituents in a reliable supervisory system which enjoyed their trust and in which everyone was a stakeholder. The International Labour Standards Department was therefore placing its full expertise at the service of the Committee so that it could play its vital role within the ILO's constitutional framework.

Statement by the Chairperson of the Committee of Experts

37. The Committee welcomed Mr Abdul Koroma, Chairperson of the Committee of Experts, who expressed his appreciation for the opportunity to participate in the general discussion and the discussion of the General Survey. The Chairperson of the Committee of Experts underscored the importance of the Committee of Experts' special sitting with the two Vice-Chairpersons of the Conference Committee, which together with his participation in the work of the Conference Committee represented the institutional framework of good practice whereby representatives of the two bodies exchanged views on matters of common interest. At the last special sitting, the Committee of Experts had duly noted the concerns expressed by the Employer Vice-Chairperson regarding the increase in the number of cases of serious failure to comply with reporting obligations, upon which the Committee of Experts had decided to institute as of its next session, the practice to launch "urgent appeals" upon the following criteria: (i) failure to send first reports for the third consecutive year; (ii) failure to reply to serious and urgent observations from employers' and workers' organizations for more than two years; and (iii) failure to reply to repetitions concerning draft legislation when developments had taken place. In such cases, the Committee of Experts might include an opening paragraph in its comments, informing the governments concerned that in the case of continued failure to supply a report or replies to the points raised by 1 September of the following year, the Committee of Experts might proceed with its examination on the basis of the information at its disposal and adopt a new comment. Similarly, the Conference Committee might call on the governments concerned to appear before it and inform the governments concerned about this possibility of the substantial consideration by the Committee of Experts in the event of continued reporting failure, thereby also reinforcing the synergies between the two supervisory bodies.
38. The Committee of Experts also welcomed the information received during the last special sitting on the methods proposed in the discussions in the Governing Body on the Standards Initiative to strengthen the supervisory system, which included: (i) the thematic grouping of Conventions for reporting purposes; (ii) the practice of consolidated comments; (iii) the introduction of an electronic document and information management system for the supervisory bodies; and (iv) the extension of the reporting cycle for technical Conventions from five to six years. Concerning the latter proposal, the Committee of Experts expressed its willingness to consider, from its next session, the manner in which it might extend the currently limited criteria for breaking its cycle of review when receiving comments from employers' or workers' organizations under article 23(2) of the ILO Constitution. Inspiration could be drawn from the criteria used for requesting early reports.

39. The Committee of Experts had noted in its report that the number of observations received from employers' and workers' organizations on the application of Conventions and Recommendations had continued to increase, which was an indicator of the vitality of the supervisory mechanism and greatly assisted it in making its assessment. The Committee of Experts had also reiterated its long-standing concern at the low proportion of reports received by 1 September, and was going to examine in more detail the treatment of reports received after the deadline of 1 September at its next meeting. Moreover, the Committee of Experts had once again called on all governments to ensure that copies of reports on ratified Conventions were communicated to the representative employers' and workers' organizations so as to safeguard this important aspect of the supervisory mechanism. Lastly, the Chairperson of the Committee of Experts drew attention to the General Survey concerning working-time instruments. The scope of the General Survey was particularly ambitious as it covered all working-time aspects (hours of work, weekly rest, annual leave, night work and part-time work) regulated by ILO instruments (nine Conventions, one Protocol and six Recommendations on working time). He referred to the positive developments and challenges identified in the General Survey, including those brought by new working arrangements. Informing about the content of the General Survey, he referred, among other things, to the importance of social dialogue and collective bargaining in the implementation of Conventions on working time, as well as the need for effective labour inspection and dissuasive penalties for non-compliance with working-time provisions.
40. The Committee of Experts was firmly engaged in meaningful dialogue with the Conference Committee and all other ILO supervisory bodies, in the interest of an authoritative and credible ILO supervisory system and ultimately for the cause of international labour standards and social justice worldwide.
41. Lastly, the Chairperson of the Committee of Experts announced the departure of Professor Mario Ackerman and Justice Ajit Prakash Shah from the Committee of Experts and paid homage to their long-standing and invaluable contributions to its work.

Statement by the Employer members

42. The Employer members welcomed the presence of the Chairperson of the Committee of Experts in the general discussion of this Committee. The Employer members indicated that for more than 90 years, the Conference Committee had been at the centre stage of the regular standards supervision. The Committee had provided a regular forum for dialogue between tripartite constituents on the application of ratified Conventions and other standards-related obligations. Tripartite dialogue in the Conference Committee was based on two elements: the report of the Committee of Experts, and the contributions from the members of the Conference Committee, who brought their own assessment of the application of the Conventions in law and practice, their real and practical understanding of the economic and social situation in ILO member States, their knowledge of the latest developments and their rich experience in labour and social affairs. In the Employer members' view, this was key to the achievement of balanced, relevant and practical conclusions of the Conference Committee, that advised the governments concerned on realistic and specific ways to fully implement ratified ILO Conventions, and thus to better compliance of member States with their obligations arising from international labour standards. This could best be achieved with the active and full participation of the tripartite constituents of the ILO at all stages of the supervisory process. Achieving better compliance did not only require pointing to failures in proper implementation, but also shed more light on cases of progress and emphasizing best practices. While the Conference Committee discussed and reached conclusions on some 24 cases, its members also commented on general application problems, including the provision of guidance to the Committee of Experts in carrying out its preparatory work. To ensure full governance and ownership, further measures should be considered to extend tripartite supervision to areas that, thus far, had been left only to the Committee of Experts.

43. The Employer members highlighted a number of positive elements in the report of the Committee of Experts. First, the mandate of the Committee of Experts had once again been reproduced in paragraph 19 of the report, thus clarifying that its opinions and recommendations were non-binding. Second, the systematic reference made by the Committee of Experts in its observations to the discussions and conclusions of the Conference Committee reflected the increasing integration of the two main supervisory bodies, which should be continued. Third, they welcomed the decision taken by the Committee of Experts, based on the proposal of the Employer members made last year, to launch “urgent appeals” of cases of serious reporting failure, and to draw the attention of the Conference Committee to those cases. This enabled the Conference Committee to advise the governments concerned that, in the absence of a report, the Committee of Experts might examine the substance of the matter at its next session. This new practice was most likely to have an important impact on the work of the Conference Committee as of 2019.
44. The Employer members made a number of proposals to increase the effectiveness, transparency and relevance of the regular standards supervision: (i) in view of the need to render the report of the Committee of Experts more reader-friendly and transparent, it should contain clear, concise and straightforward language with concrete requests for action; (ii) it would be desirable to include hyperlinks in the electronic version of the Committee of Experts’ comments to relevant earlier Committee of Experts’ comments and Conference Committee discussions, as well as the text of submissions made by employers’ and workers’ organizations to the Committee of Experts, in so far as these organizations wished to have them made publicly available; these submissions could then also be published on the NORMLEX website; and (iii) as stated in the 2017 Joint Position of the Workers’ and Employers’ groups, reports of missions regarding Conference Committee conclusions or a summary with the non-confidential concrete results of missions should be published on the Conference Committee web page and/or the NORMLEX website. The Employer members specifically requested that a number of issues should be included on the agenda of the next meeting on the working methods of the Conference Committee, including: (a) more direct cooperation and dialogue between members of the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee; (b) the exploration of the possibility of the Conference Committee to examine the implementation of conclusions adopted in previous years rather than simply posting them on the dedicated Conference Committee website, as well as the improvement of the Conference Committee web page, including by adding information on tripartite deliberations, and enabling full access to the submissions made by the constituents during the Committee’s work; and (c) improvements in the supply of information by member States in D documents, including the encouragement of member States concerned by the preliminary list of cases to provide updated information on their cases one month in advance of the opening of the International Labour Conference, which the Office would make available on the Conference Committee web page. This would allow the social partners to access the latest information from governments to narrow down the preliminary list, and would allow the tripartite constituents to prepare interventions for the discussion in the Conference Committee in advance with all the necessary up-to-date information.

45. The Employer members also raised a number of concerns relating to the regular supervision of standards: (i) given the continued failure of many governments to comply with their reporting obligations, they trusted that the present efforts to streamline reporting, including extending the possibilities for e-reporting as considered by the Governing Body in March 2018, would facilitate reporting and increase reporting rates in the future. Nevertheless, more fundamental steps were needed to respond to this issue. In particular, consolidation, concentration and simplification of ILO standards themselves would be required. This had already been achieved to a significant extent in the field of maritime labour standards, and it was hoped that the work of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group would also lead to progress in this respect in other standards areas; (ii) the criteria concerning the differentiation between observations and direct requests as described in paragraph 41 of the Committee of Experts' report, in particular, the criteria termed "primarily of a technical nature", for direct requests and "important discrepancies" for observations, were not entirely clear and gave rise to some confusion. In many cases, it was difficult to understand why a comment had been classified in the chosen category as opposed to the other. This was important because direct requests were not included in the report of the Committee of Experts. By making comments and recommendations to governments in the form of direct requests, a major part of the substantive issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions was removed from tripartite supervision. The Employer members therefore called on the Committee of Experts to make all comments that concerned compliance issues and respective recommendations in the form of observations; (iii) the Employer members also expressed concern with regard to the decision of the Committee of Experts to depart from the regular reporting cycle in some cases and not in others. While they recognized the discretion of the Committee of Experts in this respect, they also emphasized that, in the spirit of good governance, there should be transparency surrounding the reasoning when the reporting cycle was altered. In future reports, relevant information on similar cases should be provided by the Committee of Experts; and (iv) the Employer members raised concerns with regard to the discrepancy that might arise between the Conference Committee's conclusions and the comments of the Committee of Experts, referring to a case in relation to which the Committee of Experts had noted with satisfaction action taken by the Government that clearly disregarded the Conference Committee's own conclusions; they called upon the Committee of Experts, when making assessments, to duly take into account the conclusions of the Conference Committee which reflected tripartite consensus.
46. The Employers members reiterated their belief in fundamental principles and rights at work, including freedom of association, as the foundation for democracy. At the same time, they emphasized their continued disagreement with the direct connection made by the Committee of Experts between Convention No. 87 and an explicit right to strike, and with its broad interpretation in this respect. They highlighted the fact that, in the Committee of Experts' Report, out of 49 observations on Convention No. 87, 33 dealt in one way or another with the right to strike, which included comments that dealt exclusively with the right to strike. The Employer members wished to put on record that they did not recognize the Committee of Experts' interpretation of a right to strike under Convention No. 87 and that they firmly maintained their dissenting position on this issue. Additionally, they expressed concern about the frequent reference by the Committee of Experts to cases examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association. They stressed that the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association had different legal bases and mandates. While the situations that the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee of Experts were confronted with might often be similar, the important differences between the two procedures should not be disregarded when making such references.

Statement by the Worker members

47. The Worker members welcomed the presence of the Chairperson of the Committee of Experts in the general discussion of the Conference Committee. They observed that the world was currently experiencing upheaval in several respects: (i) the globalization of the economy was allowing the free movement of capital with the sole objective of achieving profit, which often had detrimental social and environmental consequences; (ii) climate change and environmental issues would give rise to an increasing number of work-related problems; and (iii) armed conflict was laying waste to certain whole regions. Those three phenomena were closely linked and were behind the massive migratory flows which were raising fundamental questions concerning how work-related issues should be addressed in a context which was also characterized by the emergence of authoritarian regimes in certain countries that were not very respectful of civil liberties and fundamental rights. The problems that arose in that regard constituted challenges for the ILO, in which the Committee had an important role to play as one of the two pillars of the Organization in the supervisory system for international labour standards, alongside the Committee of Experts.
48. The Worker members welcomed the extensive references in the report of the Committee of Experts to the conclusions of the Conference Committee, which was a significant development. They suggested, however, that the Committee of Experts might examine in greater detail the manner in which each of the recommendations was given effect by the governments concerned. They also welcomed the initiative by the Committee of Experts to ensure a better balance between the various types of Conventions in the selection of cases with a double footnote. The Committee of Experts should pay as much attention as possible to the so-called technical Conventions.
49. The Worker members shared the concern of the Committee of Experts in relation to the backlog accumulated by many governments in presenting their reports. Only 38.2 per cent of the reports requested had been received by 1 September 2017, which was a lower rate than the previous year. Such delays were detrimental to the quality of the work carried out by the Committee of Experts. They therefore called on governments to comply with their reporting obligations within the required time limits. They were however aware of the fact that such failings were not always intentional, but were due to practical difficulties. The technical assistance provided by the Office in this respect was valuable and reflection was required on the best way in which it could be reinforced. They also echoed the comment by the Committee of Experts that several governments were still not fulfilling their obligation to communicate the reports beforehand to workers' and employers' organizations. Those cases of failures offered an indication of the importance accorded to dialogue and concerted social action in the countries concerned.
50. Responding to certain proposals made during the discussions, the Worker members indicated that: (i) the observations in the Committee of Experts' report were directed at stakeholders who were accustomed to the particular vocabulary used, the governments and the social partners and should therefore respond only to the need for clarity and precision. The Employer members' proposal to simplify the vocabulary used in the Committee of Experts' report should therefore be subject to an in-depth discussion; (ii) they did not support the Employer members' proposal to publish the observations communicated to the Committee of Experts by workers' and employers' organizations which so agreed, as that risked undermining the discretion and independence of the Committee of Experts; (iii) the explanation of the circumstances that could result in an interruption of the reporting cycle in paragraph 64 of the Committee of Experts' report seemed clear and sufficient. Such circumstances constituted safeguards intended to maintain the effectiveness of the regular supervisory system; and (iv) the opportunities for exchanges between the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts, which were already in place, were sufficient and it did not seem necessary to set up more.

- 51. Responding to the comment by the Employer members, who had recalled their position concerning Convention No. 87 and the right to strike, the Worker members wished, in turn, to recall that they considered that the right to strike was recognized within the framework of Convention No. 87. That right was related to the exercise of freedom of association, which was not only a fundamental ILO principle and right but also a fundamental element of all democracies. In that regard, the Worker members recalled that the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the rights to freedom of peaceful assembly and of association had indicated that the right to strike was enshrined in international law and that its protection was necessary to ensure fair, stable and democratic societies. They recalled the constructive and concerted work carried out in the Committee since 2015 to establish effective regular supervisory mechanisms and hoped that those mechanisms would continue to be strengthened, beyond differences in viewpoints, in order to achieve the objectives of the ILO.

Statement by Government members

- 52. The Government member of Bulgaria, speaking on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States, the candidate countries Montenegro, Serbia and Albania, the potential candidates Bosnia and Herzegovina and Georgia, emphasized that the regular and successful monitoring of the application of international labour standards was crucial to ensure the mandate and authority of the ILO and welcomed the recent changes made to the functioning of the Conference Committee. Given that the improvement of the working methods of the Conference Committee was under way, she made a few comments and recommendations in that connection: (i) issues covered by the complaints procedure under article 26 of the ILO Constitution should, to the extent possible, not be discussed in the Conference Committee to avoid duplication; (ii) assessing the seriousness of some cases, based on the report of the Committee of Experts, was sometimes challenging, particularly when the report did not contain up-to-date information, and she therefore strongly encouraged governments on the preliminary list to provide the Office with any available information once the list was issued, which should be shared with all ILO constituents. In this respect, it would be useful to have a clear assessment of each case by the Committee of Experts on the situation. In some cases, the assessments in the report related only to specific aspects, which did not provide a clear overall picture of the level of compliance with the Conventions in question. In other cases, the Committee of Experts only referred to the observations of the social partners and it was difficult to evaluate the seriousness of the situation from the report; (iii) while the constraints of the Workers and Employers relating to internal consultations were understandable, having the final list of cases when the Conference Committee had already started made preparation more complicated. It was therefore essential to have available, for each case discussed in the Conference Committee, a clear description of the issue at stake, along with the most up-to-date information and opinions of the Committee of Experts to allow for an informed and fruitful discussion; (iv) General Surveys should assist and inform the discussion of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group, in its task to update and modernize the body of Conventions and Recommendations. Outcomes of the Tripartite Working Group discussions could also feed into the General Survey discussion of the Conference Committee. The results of the discussions in the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group and on the General Surveys could then be communicated to the Governing Body for further discussion.
- 53. The Government member of Brazil supported the request made by the Employer members that information should be provided by the Committee of Experts in relation to each individual case where it had departed from the regular reporting cycle. He emphasized that this would respond to the need for transparency and enhanced legal certainty in the existing supervisory procedure.

Reply of the Chairperson of the Committee of Experts

54. The Chairperson of the Committee of Experts recalled that his attendance in the general discussions and on the General Survey was an element of the long-standing arrangements under which the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts – as the two pillars of the regular supervisory mechanism – had engaged in constructive dialogue throughout the years. That ongoing dialogue was carried out in a spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility between the two Committees, as reiterated in the General Report of the Committee of Experts and demonstrated again throughout the current discussion in the Conference Committee. Many positive and some less positive comments had been made on the report of the Committee of Experts and the innovations introduced this year clearly demonstrated that that dialogue was a fruitful and important component of the successful functioning of the ILO supervisory mechanism.
55. The comments made by the members of the Conference Committee, including the requests for clarification on the criteria for the examination of cases outside the reporting cycle and the suggestions made by the Employer members, had retained his full attention and would be transmitted to the Committee of Experts. In this regard, the Committee of Experts would continue to give careful consideration to the views expressed by the tripartite constituents in the Conference Committee and the work of the Governing Body. In this context, he welcomed the emphasis placed by the Employer members on the importance of freedom of association as the basis of democracy and their recognition of the right of workers and employers to take industrial action in support of their legitimate industrial interests. Regarding the persistent concerns of the Employer members in relation to Convention No. 87 and the right to strike, he referred to paragraph 17 of the report of the Committee of Experts which reflected the important considerations of the Committee on that matter. Recalling that only Article 9 of Convention No. 87 left the extent of the guarantees of the Convention – in relation to the police and armed forces – to be determined by national laws and regulations, the Committee of Experts had highlighted the careful attention given to the useful information provided in the reports of member States and the comments from employers' and workers' organizations on the way in which that right was regulated at national level. The Committee of Experts had also emphasized that that question was only one of a wide range of important issues raised under Convention No. 87. As regards the General Survey, the rich discussions held in the Conference Committee were yet another example of how General Surveys and the related discussions in the Conference Committee could usefully inform broader tripartite processes and discussions concerning, in particular, standard-setting activities.

Reply of the representative of the Secretary-General

56. The representative of the Secretary-General welcomed the acknowledgment by the members of the Conference Committee of the usefulness of ILO technical assistance in resolving long-standing issues related to the application of ratified Conventions and the call for the Office to even further develop its activity in this area. Such sentiments reflected the assessment the Office had conducted in the context of the implementation report of the Programme and Budget for the biennium 2016–17 submitted to the present session of the Conference, in particular the review of outcome 2 concerning the ratification and application of international labour standards. Building on the lessons learned, three main priorities had been set in the current biennium: (i) increased reach of international labour standards through wider ratification; (ii) enhanced action by tripartite constituents and other actors at country level for the application of international labour standards, supported through national and multilateral planning frameworks such as Decent Work Country Programmes (DWCPs) and United Nations Development Assistance Frameworks (UNDAFs) or equivalent planning frameworks; and (iii) effective engagement of and ownership by tripartite constituents in the preparation, adoption, reporting and review of international labour standards. These priorities were expected to increase the effectiveness of the impact of international labour standards and enable member States to advance towards the attainment of the relevant targets set in the United Nations Sustainable Development Goals.

57. The Office had taken due note of the many concrete suggestions with respect to questions that would be further discussed in the framework of the Standards Initiative, particularly during the tripartite informal consultations on the working methods of the Conference Committee. The Office would spare no effort to follow up on these suggestions within the limits of its available resources. The range, scope and content of the interventions of the members of the Conference Committee on the General Survey on working-time instruments had confirmed the topical nature of the subject and its importance for the future of work. The outcome of the discussion and the report on its discussions would be communicated to the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on working time and work–life balance tentatively planned for 2019, as well as to the Tripartite Working Group of the Standards Review Mechanism when it would examine instruments concerning working time.

Concluding remarks

58. The Worker members welcomed the discussions on the respective roles of the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts, and on the ways of improving interaction between the two bodies. They recalled that these discussions should take place in the context of mutual respect for the independence of each body and with the sole concern of enhancing the functioning of the regular supervisory system for international labour standards. The Worker members also underscored the fact that the relation with the Committee of Experts was part of a process of collaboration and not integration. They emphasized that the Conference Committee should not exert any form of oversight over the other supervisory bodies. They also considered that the reproduction of the observations of the Committee on Freedom of Association did not pose any problem. On the contrary, the necessary links should be established between the supervisory bodies to ensure a consistent approach to the standards under their supervision.
59. The Employer members considered that the work of the Committee of Experts was an important component in the successful functioning of the work of the Conference Committee, as well as an important element of the regular standards supervisory system as a whole. Ongoing dialogue between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee was of utmost importance, not only for ILO constituents to better understand standards-related obligations but also to facilitate the understanding of the Committee of Experts of the practical realities and needs of the users of the supervisory system. They agreed with the Worker members that it was important to always maintain the independence of the Committee of Experts but also emphasized the importance that those two pillars of the supervisory system should be open and willing to listen to each other, as well as to the tripartite constituents, and to implement measures to make the regular standards supervisory system more user-friendly, effective and transparent so that all could work together to facilitate the understanding and best possible application of international labour standards. The discussion on the General Survey had been an opportunity to review the diversity in ILO member States regarding law and practice in the field of working time, which reflected different levels of efficiency, and working cultures, different sectoral requirements, diverse workplace needs, such as of micro-enterprises, and different legal approaches. That analysis had been very instructive and highlighted some of the challenges that lay ahead concerning the regulation in the area of working time.

C. Reports requested under article 19 of the Constitution

General Survey concerning working-time instruments

- 60. The Committee discussed the General Survey carried out by the Committee of Experts on the following working-time instruments: the Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1); the Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14); the Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930 (No. 30); the Forty-Hour Week Convention, 1935 (No. 47); the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89); the Protocol of 1990 to the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948; the Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1957 (No. 106); the Holidays with Pay Convention (Revised), 1970 (No. 132); the Night Work Convention, 1990 (No. 171); the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (No. 175); the Night Work of Women (Agriculture) Recommendation, 1921 (No. 13); the Holidays with Pay Recommendation, 1954 (No. 98); the Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Recommendation, 1957 (No. 103); the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation, 1962 (No. 116); the Night Work Recommendation, 1990 (No. 178); and the Part-Time Work Recommendation, 1994 (No. 182).
- 61. The General Survey took into account information on law and practice provided by 124 governments under article 19 of the ILO Constitution, as well as the information provided by member States which had ratified the Conventions in their reports under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution. The General Survey also reflected the comments received from 30 workers' organizations and 11 employers' organizations pursuant to article 23 of the Constitution.
- 62. The Chairperson of the Committee of Experts noted that it was the first time that a General Survey addressed all the aspects of working time together. The General Survey identified positive aspects, in particular in the legislation of many countries which was in conformity with key aspects of ILO Conventions on hours of work, weekly rest and paid annual leave. The General Survey also highlighted the efforts made in many countries to promote and regulate part-time work. Nonetheless, the Committee of Experts had noted that many issues remained in practice, such as long hours of work and their impact on the health and well-being of workers. Other issues related to financial compensation being provided in lieu of weekly rest, long qualifying periods of service being fixed for workers to be entitled to annual leave with pay, and annual holidays being divided into many parts or postponed for long periods of time. In the context of night work, necessary protective measures, such as limits to overtime, maternity protection and social services, were not frequently contained in national legislation. In the case of part-time workers, the General Survey highlighted the need to improve equality in employment conditions and social protection coverage. The Committee of Experts had also identified emerging challenges, including the increased use of on-call work and the impact of information and communication technologies on the organization of work and on working-time arrangements. The General Survey noted the role of collective bargaining and social dialogue in the implementation of the ILO instruments on working time. Lastly, the Committee of Experts had recalled the importance of ensuring that effective mechanisms were in place to secure compliance with working-time provisions, primarily through labour inspection and the application of dissuasive penalties for non-compliance.

General remarks on the General Survey and its topicality

63. The Committee welcomed the opportunity to discuss the General Survey which comprehensively covered all aspects of working time. Both Worker and Employer members, as well as a number of Government members, stressed that addressing this subject matter was particularly timely in a changing world of work.
64. The Worker members noted that the General Survey contained important findings to support the work of the Committee towards guaranteeing effective decent working time for all workers. They noted that the effective application of the limits to working time of eight hours a day and 48 hours a week which were already envisaged in the Treaty of Versailles, remained a current challenge. They stressed that limits on hours of work must take into account the health and safety of workers and the importance of “work–life balance”. Too many workers were deprived of that protection. They highlighted that the General Survey provided details on how effect was given to working-time regulations in ILO member States, both in law and in practice.
65. The Employer members noted that the General Survey was the first that comprehensively addressed all working-time aspects. They noted that the General Survey covered as many as 16 ILO instruments but seemed to cover the Conventions in much more detail than the Recommendations. In view of ongoing discussions on this in the Governing Body, the Employer members stressed that the function of General Surveys was to examine selected ILO standards, and not to examine a particular subject. In shedding light on difficulties in the implementation or ratification of the selected instruments, as well as potential gaps in their coverage, General Surveys enabled the ILO to make decisions on any necessary action regarding the instruments examined. They considered that the General Survey confirmed the existing diversity in ILO member States on working time law and practice, reflecting different levels of productivity, different working cultures, different sectoral requirements and different legal approaches. Working time was an issue that was subject to constant changes and required regular adaptation to new realities. Enhancements in technology and communications were changing the traditional time and space dimensions of work. There were also other factors such as the increased feminization of labour markets that were changing traditional working-time schemes. Workplace flexibility, both in terms of working time and location, was the most salient characteristic of the new world of work. Flexibility made life easier for many individuals with family or other responsibilities and allowed them to take control of the balance between their work and other life duties. They stressed that the organization of working time was of fundamental importance for the productivity, performance, competitiveness, sustainability and the ability to create jobs of enterprises. Any regulation of working time had to carefully balance both the protection needs of workers and the varying and evolving needs of enterprises, in particular in the following respects: the efficient use of machinery and equipment; the time preferences of markets and customers; the scarcity of skilled workers in labour markets; and the need to keep labour costs contained.
66. The Government member of Bulgaria speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, as well as Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Georgia, Montenegro and Serbia, noted that the number of hours worked and their organization had major impacts on the life of workers and in particular on their health and safety and work–life balance. In addition to safeguarding workers’ health and safety, effective policies in the area of working-time regulations played a crucial role in sustaining business performance, security, productivity and competitiveness and in ensuring a level playing field for enterprises. The General Survey showed that progress had been made in many parts of the world with regard to legislation related to weekly limits, weekly rest and holidays with pay, but that many challenges remained. Due to the development of new technologies, the boundaries between working time and rest periods threatened to become blurred.

67. The Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries, noted that working-time issues were at the very centre of policy discussions and design and in the Nordic countries largely regulated by collective agreements between social partners. The importance of the issues of working time feeding into the discussion on the Future of Work Initiative was stressed. The Government members of Belgium and Kenya underlined that the General Survey provided a clear overview of new trends and developments around the world in the field of working time.
  68. The Employer member of Brazil and a Worker member of Colombia highlighted that in the context of the future of work, working time today was a point that required particular attention. The Worker member of the Republic of Korea stated that regulation of working hours was essential to achieve social justice, a core value of the ILO.

Importance of the ILO instruments on working time

69. A number of members of the Committee commented on the value and relevance of the ILO instruments on working time covered in the General Survey.
70. The Employer members highlighted that the wide diversity of ILO member States and the developments in the world of work made it difficult to set generally recognized international standards on working time and to create a level playing field in this area at global level. The common denominator for international regulations in this field seemed small. The fact that ILO working-time Conventions had generally low ratification rates, particularly in Asia and the Pacific region, could be an indicator that they had gone beyond this common denominator.
71. The Worker members stated that since its creation in 1919, the issue of working time was at the core of the ILO's mandate and agenda and of its standard-setting activities over its first century. The General Survey showed that even the very first ILO Convention, Convention No. 1 on hours of work, was far from being universally applied, which demonstrated the need for vigorous action in this area. There was a need to clarify the misunderstandings reported by the Committee of Experts in relation to the 16 instruments covered by the General Survey. The ratification and effective implementation of these instruments had to be promoted.
72. The Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries, stressed that working-time instruments were at the core of international labour standards. Enhancing the relevance of these instruments and keeping them up to date was a current challenge for the ILO. In the midst of the new trends in the world of work, it was important to hold on to the fact that standards relating to daily and weekly hours of work, weekly rest, paid annual leave, part-time and night work, remained relevant and important for promoting decent working conditions and fair competition.
73. The Government member of Argentina considered that working time represented one of the most relevant pillars of international labour standards. The Employer member of India stated that the review of the working-time instruments had become long overdue. The Worker member of the United Kingdom, speaking also on behalf of the Worker member of the United States, noted that the current problems experienced by workers illustrated why ILO standards on working time remained relevant.

Hours of work

74. The Worker members reaffirmed the importance of the double limit of eight hours a day and 48 hours a week and noted that the regulation of working time was an essential tool for achieving social justice. The definition of working hours was not always applied in accordance with Convention No. 30. In some countries, only the daily limit or the weekly limit applied. Regulating working time and fixing limits to the daily and weekly hours of work was vital. Highlighting the impact that long hours had on the health and well-being of workers, they stressed that limits on hours of work had to take into account workers' health and safety and the need to ensure work–life balance. Adequate protection was necessary to prevent excessive fatigue and to guarantee that workers could rest and engage in social activities. With respect to the possibility of exclusions and exceptions to normal working hours, the Worker members stated that the scope of the Conventions offered considerable flexibility, allowing countries to exclude certain categories of workers from definitions and the application of important provisions. The large number of excessive derogations from the standards set in the Conventions on working time were of particular concern and exposed workers to possible burn out. Social dialogue and collective bargaining had an important role to play in the fixing of limits to hours of work. The Worker members hoped for a rapid increase in the number of ratifications of Conventions Nos 1, 30 and 47. They called on the ILO to launch a campaign to promote the ratification and effective implementation of these instruments, and to provide legal explanations, technical assistance and training on this subject, where necessary.

75. The Employer members recalled that it had already been noted in the 2005 General Survey on hours of work that Conventions Nos 1 and 30 did not fully reflect modern realities in the regulation of working time and that there were elements that were clearly outdated. There had been no new ratification for those Conventions since that time. The provisions of the two Conventions were too detailed and restrictive, in particular: maximum normal working hours, their variable distribution, and possible temporary or permanent exceptions were defined too narrowly; averaging of working hours was only permitted in exceptional cases; exceptions from the normal working hours often required regulation by the government or the public authorities, leaving insufficient room for collective or individual agreements between employers and workers; and the provisions on compensation of overtime were unduly restrictive. The Employer members considered that while health was a relatively objective and broadly accepted concept that could be used in determining working-time limits, the same could not be said with regard to “well-being” and work–life balance. These concepts frequently referred to in the General Survey were subjective and too vague to be used to define working-time limits. In their view, working time was not a good indicator of work performance, and attention had to be placed on results. Finally, they noted that Convention No. 47 establishing the principle of the 40-hour week was ratified only by 15 countries, showing that after more than 80 years this principle was not accepted by the large majority of ILO member States. A new approach on working-time regulations was required that would not be rigid and that would allow employers, workers and institutions to respond to dynamic needs and to find an appropriate balance at every point of their working life or at any stage of the business development.
76. The Government member of Bulgaria, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, as well as Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Georgia, Montenegro and Serbia, highlighted that the number of hours worked had a major impact on the life of workers, in particular on their health and safety and work–life balance. The EU directive on working time was the main regulatory instrument in this area. It protected the health and safety of workers while at the same time ensuring a level playing field. Protection of workers' health and safety at work as well as the right to work–life balance were also among the principles of the European Pillar of Social Rights proclaimed in November 2017. EU law only permitted certain derogations to regulations on hours of work, such as the establishment of long reference periods on working time, by collective agreement.
77. The Government members of Argentina, India and the Islamic Republic of Iran highlighted that the number of hours worked, together with the way they were distributed, affected the quality of work and life outside of work and noted the possible impact of excessive working hours on the health of workers. At the same time, working hours were central in determining the productivity and sustainability of the company.

78. The Worker member of the Republic of Korea indicated that a deregulation of working hours and too many exceptions allowed in the application of working-time standards were harmful to the health and safety of the workers.
79. A number of Government members provided an overview of their national legislation and compliance with the provisions of the Conventions on hours of work. The Government member of the Republic of Korea indicated that an amendment to the Labour Standards Act in March 2018 had reduced the maximum working hours from 68 to 52 per week.
80. The Worker member of Ghana indicated that workers in the informal economy, which represented about 90 per cent of the total labour force, worked up to 70 hours a week despite the legal limit of 40 hours. The Worker member of the Philippines indicated that despite recent statistics showing that an important part of the workforce was overworked, the national Parliament passed a bill in 2017 on a compressed work week which would increase the eight hours a day to 12 hours a day. The Worker member of the Republic of Korea stated that every year around 300 workers were officially recognized as affected by overwork-related diseases and that there were many cases of suicide related to work. The Worker member of Switzerland indicated that excessive working hours in the country was shown by the high number of cases of burn out.

Weekly rest

81. The Employer members noted that Conventions Nos 14 and 106 on weekly rest had a higher ratification rate than the Conventions on hours of work. Convention No. 14 was a relatively flexible instrument in that it allowed almost unconditional total or partial exceptions to the normal weekly rest days, as well as exceptions to compensation where it was not possible to grant the weekly rest days. Since Convention No. 106 allowed exceptions to weekly rest only under much stricter conditions, and did not foresee exceptions regarding the provision of compensation, its application could be problematic, especially in particular sectors. In their view, employers and workers should be able to choose in certain limited cases to replace compensatory rest by financial compensation. Finally, they noted that the approach in the recent maritime instruments which provided for a choice to either set maximum working hours or minimum hours of rest seemed worth considering also beyond the maritime sector.
82. The Worker members indicated that despite the higher rate of ratifications of the instruments on weekly rest, too many workers were deprived of their right to a 24-hour weekly rest due to the excessive resort to exceptions provided in the Conventions. This was of particular concern in light of the impact of the absence of weekly rest on workers' health and safety as well as in terms of work-life balance.
83. A number of Government members provided an overview of their national legislation implementing the provisions of the Conventions. The Worker member of Switzerland indicated that draft amendments to the Labour Law which were currently being considered would largely abolish the maximum weekly hours of work and the prohibition of working on Sunday for workers in managerial positions. An observer representing the World Organization of Workers indicated that due to the crisis that affected the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, many workers were forced to work on their days of rest in order to compensate for the low purchasing power associated with their salary in a context of hyperinflation.

Annual holidays with pay

84. The Worker members indicated that due to the numerous exceptions to the rules provided in Convention No. 132, too many workers were deprived of the right to an annual holiday with pay. This was of concern as it had an impact on their health and safety and work–life balance.
85. The Employer members considered that Convention No. 132 was unduly detailed and set limits which seemed to be far from universally recognized. They noted that this instrument had not been classified as up to date by the ILO Governing Body. This was the case for instance with the six-month limit imposed for the qualifying period of service for entitlement to annual leave, a limit which was not respected in many countries. With regard to monetary compensation in lieu of leave, they noted that the Convention did not limit this possibility to cases of termination of employment, as suggested in the General Survey. Monetary compensation that did not concern the minimum annual leave of three working weeks would be in line with the Convention.
86. The Government member of the Republic of Korea pointed out that contrary to what was said in the General Survey, workers in the agriculture sector were entitled to paid annual leave. It also had to be noted that, under the Labour Standards Act, workers who continuously worked for less than a year were granted one day of paid leave for each month attended in full, and that periods during which a worker took time off due to any injury or sickness arising out of duty and periods of leave for maternity and childcare were deemed to be periods of attendance at work for the purpose of the calculation of annual leave.
87. The Employer member of Australia indicated that employees were demanding greater flexibility in their work and that they often requested to carry over unused leave from year to year and to take annual leave as single days.
88. The Worker member of the United Kingdom, speaking also on behalf of the Worker member of the United States, indicated that in the United States there was no law on vacation leave and that, in the United Kingdom, workers were often owed their holiday pay. A Worker member of Colombia indicated that, due to the conditions of employment in Colombia, many workers had not benefited from holidays with pay in many years.

Night work

89. The Employer members stated that according to the General Survey, technological and economic changes had led to an increase in the demand for the round-the-clock provision of certain services. Nevertheless, it seemed that there was no clear trend towards an overall increase of night work and that the share of night workers remained relatively low. The very low rate of ratification of Convention No. 171 indicated that its provisions were too strict and not sufficiently practical to be accepted by a high number of countries. More generally, the approach to comprehensively regulate, in an ILO Convention, one particular form or aspect of work, such as night work, seemed to have proven not to be successful, as evidenced by the low ratification rates of a number of more recent Conventions. Subject to further discussion and findings in the Standards Review Mechanism (SRM), the Employer members suggested that Convention No. 171 may be revised in the context of a consolidation of all instruments on working time. Any future standard dealing with night work should limit itself to setting a broad policy and guidance framework without seeking to regulate details. With regard to the night work of women, there had been a shift in recent decades towards the removal of the prohibition of night work of women in industry in light of the principles of non-discrimination and equality of treatment. Protective measures for women working at night should normally not go beyond maternity protection.

90. The Worker members noted that, according to the General Survey, there was an upward trend in night work, while at the same time, more and more scientific studies were showing the negative effects of night work on the health of the workers concerned. The General Survey also highlighted the risks for pregnant women and the lack of available social services for night workers.
91. The Government member of India indicated that the existing ban on night work for women should be examined in view of the limitations that this created on employment opportunities for women. Women should be permitted to work at night with appropriate safety measures, transport and medical facilities and a health environment guaranteeing their protection. National legislation and international instruments should be revised accordingly. The Employer member of India stated that the lifting of the ban on women working on night shift was being recommended in light of economic and social considerations. The Government member of the Philippines referred to the adoption of regulations on night work, in response to the increase in night work and the need to provide the necessary protection to employees engaged in night work who experienced considerable disruption of family life and social activities, fatigue, anxiety, depression and adverse cardiovascular effects.

Part-time work

92. The Employer members noted that part-time work had become a regular form of employment throughout the world. The collection of statistical data could help better understand the evolving needs of both workers and employers regarding work in general and part-time work in particular. Noting the low rate of ratification of Convention No. 175, they recalled its contentious adoption process during which employers had considered that it unduly restricted the necessary flexibility of part-time work and thus its employment creation potential. They challenged the view reported in the General Survey that low wages was a major motivation for employers to employ part-time workers. Part-time work was above all a means for employers to have operational flexibility and to retain workers wishing to work part-time. It responded to the necessary flexibility for employers and workers to meet the needs in the economy and the labour market and allowed the entry or re-entry into the labour market of certain groups of workers, for instance women and people suffering health problems. On average, part-time workers were working enough to gain sufficient income. The Employer members also noted that the Convention did not provide for a right to transfer from full-time to part-time work and vice versa, but only stipulated that such transfer could be made on a voluntary basis, where appropriate, which meant that any such transfer could only be considered within the possibilities of an enterprise.
93. The Government member of Brazil reported the recent changes to the labour legislation which provided that all part-time workers enjoyed 30 days paid leave regardless of their weekly workload, compared to 18 days at the most, prior to the reform. The Government member of Algeria noted that part time often responded to the need to better reconcile work and family responsibilities, which had a positive effect on employment, particularly for women.
94. The Worker member of Italy indicated that in light of the traditional distribution of family responsibilities, three quarters of part-time employees in the country were women. For many of them, part-time was not a choice. The Worker member of Brazil indicated that the legislative reforms adopted in 2017 introduced several provisions which contradicted the principles of decent working time, including the contract modality of intermittent work. The Government member of Brazil, exercising his right of reply, clarified the main objectives and positive impact of the labour reform in his country, including issues related to working time.

Working time in non-traditional forms of work organization

95. A number of members of the Committee highlighted the importance of reflecting on working-time arrangements in the context of non-traditional forms of organizing work.
96. The Employer members indicated that economic and social changes over recent decades had resulted in increasingly diverse working-time arrangements. Flexitime arrangements were adopted as much to facilitate work–life balance, education and increased participation, as for specific business reasons. As these new realities may raise new challenges, research should be conducted on factors influencing the development of various types of working-time arrangements. This should include examination of the specific issues related to disabled workers.
97. The Government member of Bulgaria, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, as well as Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Georgia, Montenegro and Serbia, considered that the new challenges arising from new economic, demographic and technological developments required that working-time arrangements and regulations, as well as the issues related to their enforcement, received constant attention. The positive references in the General Survey to the provisions of the EU law on shift work and on-call hours were welcomed.
98. The Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries, indicated that developments and trends in the world of work and the effects of new technologies needed to be considered, together with the pressures arising out of globalization, the issues of work–life balance and the growing of the “gig economy” and the care economy which often required work around the clock.
99. A number of other Government members, including India, the Islamic Republic of Iran and Kenya, noted that it was necessary to examine the impact of emerging working-time issues like “zero hours” contracts and other forms of on-call work as well as telework.

Flexible working-time arrangements in national legislation and practice

100. The Workers members indicated that working hours averaging schemes, when applied over too long periods, risked jeopardizing the health and well-being of workers as well as their work–life balance.
101. The Government member of the Philippines made reference to the national regulations on the implementation of compressed work-week schemes which encouraged employers and workers to enter into voluntary agreements to adopt such mutually acceptable schemes.
102. The Worker member of Italy referred to the Amazon agreement on the organization of work shifts adopted in May 2018 which was the first of its kind signed by the company with trade union organizations.

Effects of new trends and technology on working-time arrangements

103. The Worker members considered that it was not acceptable that digital platforms imposed that workers concluded contracts which were not employment contracts, with the purpose of avoiding labour law. They recalled that Recommendation No. 198 established the principle of the “primacy of facts” whereby the determination of the existence of an employment relationship should be guided by the facts relating to the actual performance of work and not on the basis of how the parties describe the relationship.

- 104. The Employer members considered that the new forms of work, such as on-call work or on-demand work and telework addressed in the General Survey had little connection with the standards examined which in fact did not address these issues. These new forms of work had in common that they provided more autonomy and flexibility, including in the organization of working time. This had led to a blurring of the dividing lines between an employment relationship and self-employment. The classification of activities as employment or self-employment should be seen as an open-ended process that required constant observation of the developments and, if need be, adaptation of the demarcation criteria. However, the Employer members warned against the tendency to try to mechanically press traditional employment relationship patterns to new forms of activity and to regulate them as such, as this could potentially hinder the development of new work opportunities. They stressed that, while the ILO had competence for employment relationships, it was not competent for commercial contracts and self-employed persons. New forms of work were bringing overall advantages for enterprises and workers. Advantages for workers of telework included a reduction in commuting times, greater autonomy and flexibility in the organization of work, a better work–life balance and higher productivity. There may also be certain disadvantages, such as the tendency to work longer hours, to create an overlap between paid work and personal life (work–home interference) and the intensification of work. However, they considered that these possible disadvantages depended to a significant extent on individual perceptions and preferences. In relation to work–home interference and the question of whether there was a need for a “right to be disconnected”, the respective perceptions seemed also to be subject to a generational change.
- 105. The Government member of Bulgaria, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, as well as Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Georgia, Montenegro and Serbia, noted that with regard to the gig economy and on-demand work, the Committee of Experts had indicated that consideration may be given to the ILO Employment Relationship Recommendation, 2006 (No. 198). The need to protect workers where their contractual arrangements deprived them of their rights in respect of working time was acknowledged. Following up on the European Pillar of Social Rights, the EU was currently considering possible new legislation with the aim of establishing workers’ basic right to predictability of work and securing the effective enforcement of workers’ rights to information about their working conditions.
- 106. The Government member of Senegal noted that the new working arrangements under the digital influence were transforming labour relations and working-time regulations. New working arrangements, such as teleworking, raised difficulties in terms of labour protection, regarding hours of work unpredictability and revenue insecurity. The workers concerned were frequently considered as independent entrepreneurs and did not benefit from the same rights as workers under traditional labour relationships. At the same time, these arrangements could allow a certain working-time flexibility.
- 107. The Worker member of the United Kingdom, also speaking on behalf of the Worker member of the United States, indicated that the growth in precarious work had created new difficulties for working people, including zero hours contracts, agency work or low paid self-employment. Unpredictable working hours made it impossible to organize childcare while uncertainty over take-home pay left workers struggling to manage household bills. Zero hours workers also lacked the basic protections needed to challenge bad practice at work and were subject to bullying and degrading treatment. In parts of the gig economy, workers faced excessive surveillance and work intensification and did not benefit from paid holidays.

- 108. The Worker member of Uruguay noted that technology had allowed increased productivity. However, changes in work organization facilitated by technology had led to a lack of protection for workers. Workers were more isolated and there were no trade unions to defend them. In several labour reform processes, like in France, Brazil or Argentina, workers were not consulted. In the Mercosur, the Social and Labour Declaration should be above the labour reforms carried out in the region. An example of good practice in this field was the reduction of the length of the working day in the metal sector of Uruguay, where work had been shared thanks to technology.
- 109. The Worker member of France stated that the new digital tools had blurred the boundaries between working time and private life. In the digital economy, regulation of working conditions should be reinforced in order to avoid abuses in the name of flexibility. The right to be disconnected was essential in ensuring limits between private life and professional life. Boundaries were also blurred between workers and employers through the creation of grey zones where workers became self-employed with no access to labour rights. This was also a way of preventing workers from collectively organizing themselves against regressive working conditions.
- 110. The Worker member of the Netherlands made reference to several new flexible working-time arrangements that had in common the unpredictability of working hours and the lack of clear boundaries between working time and time off. Broken work patterns, zero hours contracts, new information and communications technology developments, and flexible schedules in the gig economy entailed unpredictable and undefined working-time arrangements which made it very difficult to combine work with care responsibilities.
- 111. The Worker member of Italy indicated that recent laws on teleworking and smart working had affected in depth the organization of work and contributed to the progressive dismantling of the protection provided for under a standard employment relationship. Replacement of workers by robots or artificial intelligence raised the question of the redistribution of the remaining work. A Worker member of Colombia expressed concerned at the generalization of non-standard forms of employment. An observer representing the International Transport Workers' Federation indicated that even where courts had correctly held that platform-based ride-hailing drivers were not genuinely self-employed persons, the nature of platform work was raising questions as to what actually counted as working time. This could be addressed by extending general principles underpinning working time to platform work.
- 112. The Employer member of Australia considered that certain entirely legitimate and legal forms of work, that were delivering both flexibility and jobs, were being deliberately vilified and misrepresented. These work options were critically important to meeting increasingly diverse and individual employee preferences on working time.

Social dialogue and collective bargaining

- 113. The Worker members indicated that the General Survey showed the importance of social dialogue, notably in setting limits to working hours and ensuring work–life balance. Agreements between employers' and workers' organizations could, for example, fix the reference period for averaging weekly hours of work or determine the circumstances in which overtime was possible. More generally, social dialogue should protect workers in case of derogation from basic rules. Given the fact that many categories of workers did not have the opportunity to participate in the social dialogue process or to designate their representatives democratically, many workers were finding themselves in a weak position vis-à-vis employers' requests for flexibility. The situation was often difficult in the smallest establishments, where unions were not present. In the case of on-demand work or the gig economy, union presence was also limited. The General Survey had noted the importance and significant contribution of collective agreements to protect the health and well-being of workers and strengthen social cohesion.

- 114. The Employer members noted that most ILO Conventions on working time required consultations of social partners when implementing their provisions in national law and practice. Several Conventions also provided for collective agreements as a means of implementation. Social partners therefore played a key role in the regulation and organization of working time. The Employer members welcomed the tendency in many countries to decentralize collective bargaining, including on working-time aspects, to the enterprise level and to allow enterprise agreements to derogate from higher level collective agreements. Such an approach enabled the parties at the enterprise level to determine working-time solutions that were more tailored to their needs. In order to provide sufficient space for enterprise-level arrangements, the legal framework needed to be sufficiently flexible. While they agreed that national law and practice, including collective agreements, had to be in conformity with ratified Conventions, they recalled that responsibility for compliance with those Conventions was only with the government, and not the parties to a collective agreement.
- 115. The Government member of Bulgaria speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, as well as Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Georgia, Montenegro and Serbia, welcomed the recognition in the General Survey of the importance of social dialogue and collective bargaining for the regulation of working time. Effective social dialogue was the cornerstone of the European social model and it was a prerequisite for the functioning of Europe's social market economy. This was why the social partners were consulted on the direction and content of envisaged EU instruments in the field of social policy. As a result, a number of agreements, including the part-time work directive and most sectoral directives on working time, were directly agreed between the social partners.
- 116. The Government member of Norway speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries noted that, in their countries, working time was to a large extent regulated by collective agreements between the social partners. There were few mandatory rules on the subject. Working-time regulation was a complex issue and needed to be balanced, both for the protection of workers and for the promotion of sustainable enterprises. The labour legislation and labour market models left most of this regulation to be negotiated between the social partners, with exception for the upper and lower limits for working hours, rest periods and paid leave.
- 117. The Government member of Argentina stated that working hours were determined through collective bargaining, as this was essential to ensure that the needs of both parties were met. The Government member of Algeria noted that whether at the national, branch or company level, social dialogue played an important role in the regulation of working time. The Government member of Kenya noted that given the transformation currently taking place in the world of work, the regulation of working time was all the more important and could be achieved through adopting or strengthening national laws and policies and ensuring the right to organize and bargain collectively so that the interests of all stakeholders could be accommodated. The Government member of Senegal stressed the centrality of collective bargaining in the process of designing regulations on working time.
- 118. The Employer member of Australia considered that there was a need to better encourage the use of collective bargaining to deliver innovations in the organization of working time in the country. This would help improve productivity and efficiency for more enterprises and work-life balance for more employees. National laws were increasingly failing to harness the power of positive relationships between employers and workers. This was of concern as increasingly technical application of the complex employment laws could put trust between the social partners and flexibility at risk.

119. The Worker member of Italy noted that in the Italian practice, collective bargaining played a central role in defining most of the working-time schedules and was recognized as a source of law in the national system of industrial relations. National level collective agreements usually specified the areas of working-time arrangement and flexibility devolved to territorial collective bargaining and to company bargaining. The Worker member of India indicated that the increase of precarious work had impacted the possibility to negotiate collectively the terms of employment. A Worker member of Colombia considered that collective bargaining was the appropriate mechanism to regulate working-time issues.

Measures taken to ensure compliance with national laws and regulations on working time

120. The Employer members noted that enforcement included a variety of measures, such as the keeping of records of working time, labour inspection, the need to obtain authorization from the competent authorities, the involvement of the social partners, and penalties for non-compliance. They considered that rationalization of State regulations, including by limiting them to what was of public interest (such as the protection of workers' health) as opposed to regulations that, in addition, aimed at better work–life balance or improved workers' well-being, could contribute to reducing enforcement efforts and thus to achieving better compliance. Possibilities to delegate enforcement to the social partners, individual agreements or other mechanisms, should also be explored. The enforcement of certain working-time provisions by public authorities may not always be necessary, as long as workers could take action in court. Moreover, enforcement efforts by the competent authorities could be concentrated on those areas where infringements could have particularly damaging effects and where control was normally difficult, such as in the informal sector or agriculture. They noted that only Conventions Nos 1 and 30 required enforcement by means of penalty. Given that these two instruments contained, to a large extent, outdated and inappropriate working-time rules, insisting on penalties for their enforcement seemed problematic. The more recent working-time Conventions did not specifically prescribe penalties but permitted any means of enforcement. This could point to a change of perception to the effect that penalties were no longer considered indispensable in the case of infringements of working-time regulation and that there were often more appropriate means of enforcement. Finally, noting that the General Survey stressed the need for penalties to be dissuasive, the Employer members considered that it was necessary to point out that penalties, where they were imposed, had not to be disproportionate. In particular, prison sentences should be the absolute exception for extreme offences.
121. The Worker members noted that the best legislation was ineffective in the absence of a mechanism of control that guaranteed its application, made it binding and, if necessary, imposed penalties for serious infringements. This was also in the interest of the employers as without this mechanism, they would suffer an unfair competition from employers who were less scrupulous in the application of the rules. The General Survey noted that the lack of staff and resources dedicated to inspection services was a recurring problem in all regions of the world. In addition, it was impossible to monitor compliance with applicable standards if there was no reliable system for notifying and recording hours of work and rest periods.
122. The Government member of Bulgaria, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, as well as Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Georgia, Montenegro and Serbia, noted the importance of undertaking a combination of preventive and enforcement activities to achieve compliance with legal provisions related to working time.
123. The Government member of Egypt expressed support for the adoption of new mechanisms and techniques to enforce the provisions on working time through the performance of labour inspection and the imposition of dissuasive sanctions. The Government member of Argentina stated that it was key to have rigorous working-time records and timely inspections. For this purpose, countries should take advantage of new technologies. The Government member of Senegal noted that labour inspectors had a primary role to play in the enforcement of working-time provisions at the national level, which was why the Government had embarked on a policy of strengthening the labour inspection services in terms of human, financial and material resources. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire indicated that provisions that aimed at guaranteeing a decent working time were regularly enforced by the labour inspection department and that controls were particularly focusing on the respect of the principles of eight hours of daily work and weekly rest, on the prohibition of night work for certain categories of workers, on the needs of workers with disabilities and on all activities that jeopardized the health and safety of workers.

124. The Worker member of the United Kingdom, speaking also on behalf of the Worker member of the United States, indicated that poor enforcement of working-time regulations meant that law-abiding firms faced unfair competition from companies who undercut standards or who misclassified individuals as self-employed.
125. Particular challenges were also highlighted with regard to the enforcement of working-time provisions in the informal economy, including by Worker members of Colombia.

Challenges to the implementation of the instruments in specific sectors

126. A number of members of the Committee highlighted existing challenges related to working time in the informal economy. They also referred to difficulties in certain sectors, such as the health sector, transport, domestic work, manufacturing, and the security sector.

Informal economy

127. The Worker member of Ghana stressed that workers in the informal economy represented 90 per cent of the workforce and that their precarious situation and low wages made it difficult for them to request reasonable hours of work and time for rest. A Worker member of Colombia indicated that informality was an obstacle to the implementation of regulations on hours of work. An observer representing the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) stressed that workers in the informal economy did not have a fixed schedule and that employers often refused to pay them overtime.
128. The Employer members indicated that enforcement efforts by the competent authorities might be concentrated on situations such as the informal economy where infringements were particularly damaging and where control was difficult.
129. The Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries, highlighted that the growing informality had to be borne in mind when addressing working time. The Government member of the Philippines noted that the legislation on working time often did not apply to the informal economy and hoped for further discussions on the issue.

Health sector

130. With respect to health services, the Worker member of Togo recalled that activity in this sector was uninterrupted, which meant long hours and work during the night. As the sector was affected by labour shortages, workers were also prevented from the possibility of taking rest or leave, at the expense of their health and family lives. Accumulated fatigue of medical workers also placed the lives of the patients in danger. A new international labour instrument was needed to ensure decent working time in the health sector. A Worker member of Colombia highlighted that in addition to the hours actually worked, medical workers were often required to remain on call.

Transport

- 131. The Worker member of the Philippines stressed the importance of working time in labour-intensive sectors such as transport. A Worker member of Colombia referred to the situation of pilots who were required to work long shifts and remain on call afterwards. An observer representing the International Transport Workers' Federation stressed that international labour standards on working time remained relevant for transport workers. Sufficient trucker rest areas as well as standard pay rates for drivers were important measures to protect workers and reduce pressure to work excessive hours. In certain cases, excessive overtime resulted from the uninterrupted functioning of infrastructures, such as the Panama Canal. Workers in commercial fishing were also often exposed to excessive working hours.

Domestic workers

- 132. The Employer member of India stressed that domestic workers, who often worked for more than one employer, needed particular attention. An observer representing the ITUC called attention to the hardship suffered by domestic workers, often working in the informal economy. They did not have a fixed working schedule and sometimes worked 24 hours a day. In most cases, they did not benefit from annual holidays, were paid below the minimum wage and were dismissed without notice.

Manufacturing

- 133. An observer representing the ITUC stressed that workers in the manufacturing sector did not have fixed schedules and were denied payment of the hours worked in overtime. An observer representing IndustriALL Global Union stressed that the severe working-time challenges in the manufacturing sector related to the business model, based on the outsourcing of production. This created a global race to the bottom in working conditions to attract foreign investments at the expense of workers. Governments did not take responsibility for the activities of their companies abroad and local authorities were often unwilling or unable to enforce the legislation on working time. Binding rules and enforceable agreements were necessary to enhance traceability and accountability in supply chains and to ensure compliance with core labour standards. In many countries of production, provisions on weekly rest and annual leave did not exist. Furthermore, workers accumulated overtime paid below the mandatory rates and working-time records did not reflect the number of hours actually worked. As a result of long hours of work, workers in these sectors accumulated fatigue and were exposed to high risks of occupational injuries. Another challenge concerned the inability for workers to exercise their right to freedom of association and to bargain collectively. The situation of workers in export processing zones was of particular concern. Measures had to be taken to enhance workplace compliance with national legislation and collective agreements on working hours in textile garment industries.

Security sector

- 134. A Worker member of Colombia indicated that penitentiary guards were required to work more than 80 hours per week, causing grave consequences for their health. An observer representing the ITUC stressed that security guards also worked without fixed schedules and were not paid overtime.

Possible ILO action

- 135. The members of the Committee indicated possible action that the ILO could take in follow-up to the General Survey.

1. Standards-related action

- 136. The Government member of Bulgaria speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, as well as Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Georgia, Montenegro and Serbia, indicated that they looked forward to an examination by the ILO tripartite constituents of the steps that could be taken to further promote the Conventions under examination, to enable these instruments to achieve their full potential and if applicable, to consolidate and update them without lowering the level of protection they provided. They hoped that the discussion of the General Survey would make a useful contribution to the tripartite meeting of experts on working time and work–life balance and to the work of the Tripartite Working Group of the Standards Review Mechanism.
- 137. The Government member of Morocco stressed the importance of updating ILO standards on working time by consolidating them in a new instrument which would take into account recent developments in the world of work and by adopting new instruments to regulate modern arrangements such as telework. The Government member of Kenya expressed support for the development of a consolidated instrument that would take into consideration all the fundamental elements provided in the General Survey, including equality for men and women workers, with a view to ensuring that standards on working time would contribute to the human rights approach to the regulation of these matters and further make it possible for workers to reconcile work and private and family life. The Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries, considered that the discussion of the General Survey would be an important input to the tripartite meeting of experts on working time and work–life balance and to the work of the Tripartite Working Group of the Standards Review Mechanism.
- 138. The Employer members stressed the need to address the obvious lack of relevance and acceptance of the working-time standards under examination. Conventions Nos 1 and 30 were considered as more or less “outdated”. Convention No. 47 had been ratified by only 15 countries. Moreover, the case of earlier sectoral Conventions on maximum hours for particular sectors, such as textile or coalmines, which had never been ratified and had been withdrawn by the Conference, demonstrated that the setting of ILO standards on maximum hours of work was not successful. The two most recent Conventions examined, Conventions Nos 171 and 175, also showed a very low ratification rate which raised doubts about their actual relevance. They also considered that the approach to set standards on specific aspects of working time, such as on night work and part-time work, had reached an impasse. Furthermore, Convention No. 132 on annual paid leave was not widely ratified and had not been considered up to date by the Governing Body. Convention No. 14 on weekly rest (industry) had attracted a relatively significant number of ratifications, which could indicate that standards on minimum rest periods met with wider acceptance than standards on maximum working hours. They concluded that the role of international labour standards in the field of working time was probably much more limited than it may have been considered to date.
- 139. The Worker members were opposed to proposals which would dilute existing minimum standards through any process of consolidation or revision, as the existing standards were extremely flexible and allowed exceptions which made it possible to take national situations fully into account. In view of the challenges arising in relation to the existing instruments, which nevertheless set out clear basic principles and important protection for all workers, it would be of no avail to devote time to the formulation of a new instrument. The approach adopted for sectoral instruments, such as the Hours of Work and Rest Periods (Road Transport) Convention, 1979 (No. 153), and the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended, which had made it possible to reinforce the general principles of working time in instruments adapted to specific sectors, still remained valid.

2. Development cooperation and technical assistance

140. The Worker members encouraged the ILO to launch a campaign to promote the ratification and effective implementation of the Conventions covered by the General Survey and to provide legal clarifications, technical assistance and training as necessary. The Office should strengthen its technical assistance, in particular for capacity building and for political support.
141. The Government member of Kenya noted that technical assistance would be necessary in ensuring enforcement of working-time provisions and in making use of new technologies for the measurement of working hours.

142. The Employer members noted that 12 instruments concerning working time were included in the initial programme of work of the Standards Review Mechanism (SRM) Tripartite Working Group. When examining the issues under consideration, the SRM Tripartite Working Group would be called to assess the specific value added of standards in this field and to consider a better synchronization and division of roles with other ILO means of action, including guidance materials. The overall architecture of future ILO standards should be taken into account. Given the lack of a universal acceptance of most working-time standards that emerged from the General Survey, individual revisions of these standards, which in an isolated way addressed specific aspects of working time, did not seem to be a meaningful exercise to undertake. One possible way forward may be to adopt a framework instrument that would address working-time policies and principles, alone or within the context of overall working conditions. Rather than setting maximum or minimum working-time limits, the instrument may specify the considerations that needed to be taken into account in setting them, such as employers' need for flexibility, workers' needs for protection, and governments' needs for achieving overall labour market outcomes. The framework instrument should be open to new developments in the field of working time and be easily adaptable. It could be complemented by guidance materials on specific working-time aspects, such as sectoral codes of practice, handbooks, case studies and databases on working-time regulations. An ILO framework instrument that replaces all existing instruments in the field of working time could become a high-profile instrument reflecting and compiling ILO competence in this area.
143. The Employer members considered that, pending the examination in the SRM Tripartite Working Group and any action taken following the recommendations of the SRM, some interim measures seemed necessary. Concerning Conventions Nos 1 and 30, the situation was particularly problematic, as ratifying countries were probably trying to silently circumvent certain outdated obligations of the Conventions and the ILO supervisory bodies may be in an embarrassing situation as they had to criticize acceptable current working-time practices that were not in line with the outdated provisions of the Conventions. This could have negative effects for the credibility of ILO standards in general. The Employer members therefore suggested that, as an interim measure, the two Conventions be shelved and ratifying countries may consider their denunciation. As regards the other Conventions examined in the General Survey, they considered that ways to concentrate reporting on crucial provisions and pool their supervision should be looked into.
144. The Worker members encouraged the ILO to launch on an urgent basis an intensive campaign to promote the ratification and effective implementation of the instruments covered by the General Survey, and to provide legal explanations, technical assistance and training on this subject, where necessary. The competent bodies of the ILO would also have to play a proactive role in order to clarify the misunderstandings reported by the Committee of Experts in relation to the 16 instruments. Recalling that the regulation of working time was essential for the achievement of social justice, they welcomed the recognition of the limits of eight hours a day and 48 hours a week. Noting that the scope of the Conventions offered considerable flexibility which allowed countries to exclude certain categories of workers from the definitions and the application of important provisions, they expressed concern at the large number of excessive exemptions from the standards set in the Conventions and they recalled the importance of consulting the social partners before establishing any special schemes or exemptions. Collective agreements had an important role to play in protecting the health and well-being of workers and reinforcing social cohesion. Overtime hours and other forms of flexibility endangered the health and well-being of workers and the balance between work and private life. The Worker members emphasized that the lack of personnel and resources of inspection services was a recurrent problem in all regions of the world. In order to enforce compliance with the applicable standards, reliable systems were required for the notification and recording of working time and rest periods. It was important for the authorities to ensure the establishment of effective means of enforcing working-time provisions, principally through labour inspection, and the imposition of dissuasive penalties in the event of violations.

145. The Worker members recalled that they were opposed to proposals which would dilute existing minimum standards through any process of consolidation or revision, as the existing standards were extremely flexible and allowed exceptions which made it possible to take national situations fully into account. They expressed support for the organization of an in-depth tripartite meeting on issues of conformity with the working-time instruments.

Outcome of the discussion of the General Survey concerning the instruments on working time

146. The Committee examined the draft outcome of its discussion of the General Survey concerning the instruments on working time.
147. The Committee approved the outcome of its discussion, which is reproduced below.

Introduction

1. Recalling that working time has been at the heart of the Organization's standard-setting activities over its first century, the Committee welcomed the opportunity to discuss this important and topical issue in the context of its examination of the General Survey concerning the following working-time instruments: the Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1), the Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930 (No. 30), the Forty-Hour Week Convention, 1935 (No. 47), the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation, 1962 (No. 116), the Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14), the Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1957 (No. 106), the Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Recommendation, 1957 (No. 103), the Holidays with Pay Convention (Revised), 1970 (No. 132), the Holidays with Pay Recommendation, 1954 (No. 98), the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89), the Protocol of 1990 to the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948, the Night Work of Women (Agriculture) Recommendation, 1921 (No. 13), the Night Work Convention, 1990 (No. 171), the Night Work Recommendation, 1990 (No. 178), the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (No. 175), and the Part-Time Work Recommendation, 1994 (No. 182).

2. The Committee noted that the organization of working time has a major impact on the physical and mental health of workers, work-life balance, the contribution of workers to society, workplace safety and the competitiveness, agility, productivity and sustainability of enterprises. The Committee recognized that finding an appropriate balance between the protection of workers and the needs of enterprises in the organization of working time remained an important goal for the realization of social justice. The Committee considered that this was all the more important in the context of the major process of change that the world of work was undergoing.

Realities and needs of member States

3. The Committee noted that the transformations currently taking place in the world of work, facilitated by developments and improvements in technology and communications, were changing many of the traditional time and space dimensions in work and having an impact on its organization. The Committee made particular reference to the new emerging working arrangements, including telework and work on platforms. It noted that these new arrangements were also being considered in the context of the Future of Work Initiative.

4. The Committee considered that the adoption of an appropriate regulatory framework on working time was important both to protect workers and to ensure a level playing field for employers. The Committee also noted that social partners through social dialogue and collective bargaining had an important role to play in setting rules and providing guidance on working time and thus ensuring that working-time arrangements better meet the concrete needs of both employers and workers.

5. The Committee noted the challenges related to the balanced adaptation and the enforcement of working-time regulations, including in the context of the new working arrangements. It stressed the need to strengthen efforts in these areas, as well as the opportunity of exploring a diversity of measures in this respect.

ILO means of action

1. Standards-related action

6. The Committee considered that the findings of the General Survey and its discussion could feed into the tripartite meeting of experts, should it take place, as contemplated in paragraph 21(a) of the conclusions concerning the recurrent discussion on social protection (labour protection) adopted by the Conference in 2015.

7. The Committee also considered that the General Survey, together with the report and outcome of this discussion, shall contribute to the work of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group on this matter.

2. Development cooperation and technical assistance

8. Acknowledging the references by a number of member States to the need for technical assistance in relation to working-time issues, the Committee expected the Office to provide the requested support and to continue to conduct the necessary research to identify possible responses to the current and emerging realities in this area, including integrated and innovative approaches to reconcile the needs of workers in terms of the balance between work, family and private life with the needs of enterprises in an increasingly integrated and competitive economy.

D. Compliance with specific obligations

1. Cases of serious failure by member States to respect their reporting and other standards-related obligations

148. During a dedicated sitting, the Committee examined the cases of serious failure by member States to respect their reporting and other standards-related obligations.<sup>5</sup> As explained in document D.1, part V, the following criteria are applied: failure to supply the reports due for the past two years or more on the application of ratified Conventions, failure to supply first reports on the application of ratified Conventions for at least two years, failure to supply information in reply to all or most of the comments made by the Committee of Experts, <sup>5</sup> Detailed information on the examination of these cases is contained in section A of Part Two of this report.

failure to supply the reports due for the past five years on unratified Conventions and Recommendations, failure to submit the instruments adopted for at least seven sessions to the competent authorities, and failure during the past three years to indicate the representative organizations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23(2) of the Constitution, copies of reports and information supplied to the Office under articles 19 and 22 have been communicated. The Chairperson explained the working methods of the Committee for the discussion of these cases.

- 149. The Employer members recalled that the functioning of the ILO supervisory system was based primarily on the information provided by governments in their reports. Compliance with reporting obligations was therefore crucial for an appropriate and effective supervision of ILO standards. The number of reports under article 22 of the ILO Constitution, which had been received by 1 September 2017, remained low, and the number of instances in which no information had been supplied in reply to comments made by the Committee of Experts, continued to be high. They regretted that, despite all efforts, it had not been possible to achieve visible progress on these long-standing issues. Submissions by workers and employers' organizations could add to the factual basis and provide a reality check but could not replace government reports. While the Office, within its existing financial and human resources capacities, should continue to provide assistance to governments in meeting these obligations, reporting was ultimately a government responsibility. It was the decision of governments to ratify Conventions, and ratification entailed reporting obligations. The Employer members noted with concern that none of the reports due had been sent for the past two or more years by 15 countries. Furthermore, 61 of the 95 first reports due had been received by the time the Committee's session had ended, and 13 member States had failed for two or more years to supply a first report, albeit the basis for a timely dialogue between the Committee of Experts and the member State on the application of the ratified Convention. They encouraged the governments concerned to request technical assistance from the Office and submit the first reports without delay. The Employer members welcomed the decision taken by the Committee of Experts, following a proposal made by the Employer members, to institute the practice of launching "urgent appeals" on cases corresponding to certain criteria of serious reporting failure and to draw the attention of the Conference Committee to these cases, so that governments could be called before the Conference Committee and, in the absence of a report, the Committee of Experts might examine the substance of the matter at its next session. With respect to reports under article 19 of the ILO Constitution, 38 countries had not sent reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations for the past five years, despite their importance for the comprehensiveness of General Surveys. As to the submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities, the Employer members noted with concern that 31 member States had failed to meet this constitutional obligation, while welcoming the efforts made by a number of countries to overcome the delays in submission.
- 150. The Worker members said that it was essential to keep the special sitting since it highlighted the large number of countries which did not respect their constitutional obligations. These failures endangered the smooth functioning of the ILO supervisory system. The sitting provided the occasion to invite countries that were not respecting their obligations to do so. The reduction in the number of reports received by comparison with the previous year was continuing. Moreover, 15 countries had not supplied the reports due for at least two years and 13 countries had not submitted first reports for at least two years. First reports that were due following a ratification were very important since they enabled an initial evaluation of the application of the Conventions concerned. In addition, 43 countries had not replied to the observations and direct requests made by the Committee of Experts. Such negligence had an adverse impact on the work of the supervisory bodies. The Worker members invited the governments concerned to send all the requested information. The production of General Surveys was also based on the reports supplied by ILO member States. It was therefore crucial that the latter should send their reports to provide the Committee with an overview of the application of ILO instruments in law and in practice, even in countries which had not ratified the Conventions concerned. In that regard, the Worker members expressed regret that 38 countries had not supplied any information for the last five years for the purposes of the General Surveys. These States would otherwise have contributed to the General Survey. The Worker members called for the positive initiatives, already taken by the Office to ensure better monitoring of the countries where there had been serious failure to meet constitutional obligations, to be strengthened in order to reverse the negative trend observed this year.

151. Regarding the obligation under the ILO Constitution to indicate the representative organizations of workers and employers to which copies of the reports on ratified Conventions had been sent, the Worker members reminded the two States concerned that it was essential that the social partners should be involved in the supervision of the application of international labour standards in their countries. With regard to cases of serious failure to submit, the Worker members recalled the importance of ensuring tripartite participation at national level in the ILO standards-setting process. They expressed regret that in their conclusions only around 20 member States of the 66 countries invited to take the floor, had come before the Committee to provide information on the serious failures noted. They also took note of the practical difficulties encountered by certain member States to fulfil their obligations. In that regard, the Office should ensure ongoing, attentive action with regard to member States by providing them with all necessary assistance to enable them to discharge their obligations. They also noted the need for training expressed by certain member States and called on the Office to commit to strengthening the provision of training in that area. The Worker members concluded by appealing to all governments concerned to, as quickly as possible, bring an end to the serious failures to fulfil their constitutional obligations.

1.1. *Failure to submit Conventions, Protocols and Recommendations to the competent authorities

152. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered the manner in which effect was given to article 19(5), (6) and (7) of the ILO Constitution. These provisions required member States within 12, or exceptionally 18, months of the closing of each session of the Conference to submit the instruments adopted at that session to the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action, and to inform the Director-General of the ILO of the measures taken to that end, with particulars of the authority or authorities regarded as competent.

153. The Committee noted that, in order to facilitate its discussions, the report of the Committee of Experts mentioned only the governments which had not provided any information on the submission to the competent authorities of instruments adopted by the Conference for at least seven sessions (from the 95th Session (2006) to the 104th Session (2015), because the Conference did not adopt any Conventions and Recommendations during the 97th (2008), 98th (2009), 102nd (2013) or 105th (2016) Sessions). This time frame was deemed long enough to warrant inviting Government delegations to the dedicated sitting of the Committee so that they may explain the delays in submission.

154. The Committee took note of the information and explanations provided by the Government representatives who took the floor during the dedicated sitting. It noted the specific difficulties mentioned by certain delegates in complying with this constitutional obligation, and in particular the intention to submit shortly to competent authorities the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference. Some governments have requested the assistance of the ILO to clarify how to proceed and to complete the process of submission to national parliaments in consultation with the social partners.

155. The Committee expressed deep concern at the failure to respect the obligation to submit Conventions, Protocols and Recommendations to national parliaments. It recalled that compliance with the obligation to submit Conventions, Protocols and Recommendations to national competent authorities was a requirement of the highest importance in ensuring the effectiveness of the ILO's standards-related activities. It also recalled that governments could request technical assistance from the Office to overcome their difficulties in this respect.

156. The Committee noted that the following countries were still concerned with the serious failure to submit the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities: Azerbaijan, Bahamas, Bahrain, Belize, Comoros, Croatia, Dominica, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Fiji, Gabon, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Kiribati, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Liberia, Libya, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Syrian Arab Republic and Vanuatu. The Committee expressed the firm hope that appropriate measures would be taken by the Governments concerned to comply with their constitutional obligation to submit.

1.2. Failure to supply reports and information on the application of ratified Conventions

157. The Committee took note of the information and explanations provided by the Government representatives who took the floor during the dedicated sitting. Some governments have requested the assistance of the ILO. The Committee recalled that the submission of reports on the application of ratified Conventions was a fundamental constitutional obligation and the basis of the system of supervision. It also recalled the particular importance of the submission of first reports on the application of ratified Conventions. It stressed the importance of respecting the deadlines for such submission. Furthermore, it underlined the fundamental importance of clear and complete information in response to the comments of the Committee of Experts to permit a continued dialogue with the Governments concerned. In this respect, the Committee expressed deep concern at the failure to respect these obligations and recalled that the ILO could provide technical assistance to contribute to compliance in this respect.

158. The Committee noted that, by the end of the 2017 meeting of the Committee of Experts, the percentage of reports received (article 22 of the ILO Constitution) was 66.5 per cent (69.5 per cent for the 2016 meeting). Since then, further reports had been received, bringing the figure to 74.1 per cent (as compared with 77.3 per cent in June 2017).

159. The Committee noted that no reports on ratified Conventions had been supplied for the past two years or more by the following States: Cook Islands, Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Gambia, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Malaysia – Sabah, Saint Lucia, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Timor-Leste and Vanuatu.

160. The Committee also noted that first reports due on ratified Conventions had not been supplied by the following countries for at least two years: Belize, Comoros, Congo, Cook Islands, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Guyana, Republic of Maldives, Nicaragua, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Serbia and Somalia.

161. The Committee noted that no information had yet been received regarding any or most of the observations and direct requests of the Committee of Experts to which replies were requested for the period ending 2017 from the following countries: Barbados, Belize, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Chad, Djibouti, Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Gambia, Grenada, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Kiribati, Kyrgyzstan, Liberia, Malawi, Malaysia, Malaysia (Peninsular Malaysia, Sabah and Sarawak), Mozambique, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Timor-Leste, Trinidad and Tobago, Vanuatu and Yemen.

1.3. Supply of reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations

162. The Committee stressed the importance it attached to the constitutional obligation to supply reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations. In effect, these reports permitted a better evaluation of the situation in the context of the General Surveys of the Committee of Experts. In this respect, the Committee expressed deep concern at the failure to respect this obligation and recalled that the ILO could provide technical assistance to contribute to compliance in this respect.
163. The Committee noted that over the past five years none of the reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations, requested under article 19 of the Constitution, had been supplied by: Afghanistan, Angola, Armenia, Belize, Botswana, Chad, Congo, Cook Islands, Dominica, Eswatini,<sup>6</sup> Grenada, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Ireland, Kiribati, Liberia, Libya, Republic of Maldives, Marshall Islands, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, South Sudan, Timor-Leste, Tonga, Tuvalu, United Arab Emirates, Vanuatu and Yemen.

1.4. Communication of copies of reports to employers' and workers' organizations

164. The Committee noted that no information had yet been received from the Plurinational State of Bolivia or Rwanda concerning the names of the representative organizations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23(2) of the Constitution, copies of reports and information supplied to the ILO under articles 19 and 22 have been communicated for the last three years. The Committee pointed out that the fulfilment by governments of their obligation to communicate reports and information to the organizations of employers and workers was a vital prerequisite for ensuring the participation of those organizations in the ILO supervisory system.

2. Application of ratified Conventions

165. The Committee noted with interest the information provided by the Committee of Experts in paragraph 54 of its report, which listed new cases in which that Committee had expressed its satisfaction at the measures taken by governments following comments it had made as to the degree of conformity of national legislation or practice with the provisions of a ratified Convention. In addition, the Committee of Experts had listed in paragraph 57 of its report cases in which measures ensuring better application of ratified Conventions had been noted with interest. These results were tangible proof of the effectiveness of the supervisory system.
166. At its present session, the Committee examined 23 individual cases relating to the application of various Conventions.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>7</sup> A summary of the information submitted by governments, the discussion and conclusions of the examination of the individual cases are contained in section B of Part Two of this report.

2.1. Specific cases

167. The Committee recalled that its working methods provided for the possibility of drawing the attention of the Conference to its discussion of the cases, a full record of which appears as Part Two of this report. It had not made use of that possibility this year.

2.2. Continued failure to implement

168. The Committee recalled that its working methods provide for the listing of cases of continued failure over several years to eliminate serious deficiencies, previously discussed, in the application of ratified Conventions. This year the Committee made no mention in this respect.

3. Participation in the work of the Committee

169. The Committee wished to express its appreciation to the 45 governments which had collaborated by providing information on the situation in their countries and participating in the discussion of their cases.

170. The Committee regretted that the Governments of the following States failed to take part in the discussions concerning their country and the fulfilment of their reporting and other standards-related obligations: Afghanistan, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Barbados, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Chad, Comoros, Congo, Croatia, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Fiji, Gabon, Kuwait, Libya, Papua New Guinea, Seychelles, Somalia, Syrian Arab Republic and Trinidad and Tobago.

171. The representative of the Secretary-General informed the Committee that the delegation of Samoa was not accredited to the Conference this year. The Government had sent a communication to the Committee of Experts relating to its compliance with Convention No. 182 in which it also explained that the absence of its delegation at the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference was due to financial difficulties. The Government also communicated its commitment to provide a full report to the Committee of Experts by the end of August 2018. The Chairperson announced that, as specified in part VII of document D.1, on the last day of the discussion of individual cases, the Committee dealt with the cases in which governments had not responded to the invitation. The refusal by a government to participate in the work of the Committee was a significant obstacle to the attainment of the core objectives of the International Labour Organization. In the case of governments that were not present at the Conference, the Committee would not discuss the substance of the case, but would draw attention in its report to the importance of the questions raised. In such a situation, a particular emphasis would be put on steps to be taken to resume dialogue.

172. The Worker members expressed regret at the absence of the Government delegation at the current session of the Conference, which prevented the Committee's examination of the case. Governments' participation at the Conference was essential to the effective functioning of the supervisory system. The Worker members highlighted key aspects of the Committee of Experts' comments that required follow-up action by the Government to redress the situation of child labour in the country. An ILO pilot study had revealed that around 38 per cent of child labour in Samoa was performed by under 15-year-olds, which compromised children's development and called into question the Government's capacity and commitment to address the worst forms of child labour. Child protection laws were inadequate and the absence of any protection for young persons between 16 and 18 years put them at particular risk of exploitation. Institutions for the protection of children did not function properly and legislative reforms had stalled. The legislative process had not advanced, for example, for bills drafted in accordance with the Optional Protocols to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, which the Government had ratified in 2016. More needed to be done to address the concerns regarding the worst forms of child labour. The Worker members urged the Government to provide a detailed report on the application of the Convention to the Committee of Experts at its next session. The Government should avail itself of ILO technical assistance to comply with its reporting obligations and tackle the worst forms of child labour.

173. The Employer members echoed the Worker members' statement and expressed regret that the Government had not attended the Conference. Non-compliance with the Convention was a serious concern and the Committee of Experts had identified three main aspects in that regard: the disparity between the ratifications of the Optional Protocols to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and the real protection of children in the country; the absence of a list of hazardous work for young persons; and the prevalence of under 15-year-olds exploited as street vendors and subjected to other abusive practices. The Government's failure to submit replies to those issues to the Committee, irrespective of its absence, was a matter of deep concern. The Employer members urged the Government to provide replies and commit to participating fully at the next session of the International Labour Conference.
174. The Committee noted with regret that the Governments of the following States, which were not represented at the Conference, were unable to participate in the discussions concerning their country and the fulfilment of their reporting and other standards-related obligations: Belize, Cook Islands, Dominica, Gambia, Grenada, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Kyrgyzstan, Republic of Maldives, Marshall Islands, Rwanda, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Timor-Leste, Tonga, Tuvalu and Vanuatu.

E. Adoption of the report and closing remarks

175. The Committee's report was adopted, as amended.
176. The Employer members stated that the work in the Committee had, once again this year, taken place in a spirit of constructiveness and openness. While divergent opinions continued to exist between the tripartite constituents within the Committee, and between the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts, they had been voiced from a position of mutual respect and with the continued commitment to a robust and balanced supervisory system. The Committee had once again demonstrated its ability to lead a meaningful and results-oriented tripartite dialogue, and adopt clear, consensual and straightforward conclusions with regard to the discussion of individual cases. It was hoped that those conclusions would contribute to a greater understanding of the recommended measures to achieve compliance with international labour standards.
177. The last meeting of the Committee before the ILO Centenary in 2019 was a unique opportunity to further improve the transparency, efficiency, relevance and strong tripartite governance of the regular supervisory mechanism. They recalled a number of the proposals with a view to achieving that objective, that they had made earlier during the general discussion. The proposals recommended: (i) making the report of the Committee of Experts more reader-friendly and including recommendations for remedial actions that were practical, straightforward, concrete and measurable; (ii) including hyperlinks in the electronic versions of the Committee of Experts' observations to its earlier comments, as well as to the discussions in the Conference Committee and copies of observations by the social partners; (iii) publishing information and/or the concrete results of missions undertaken in the follow-up to the Committee's conclusions (such information should be published on the Conference Committee web page and the NORMLEX website); (iv) further expanding the website of the Conference Committee as necessary; (v) seeking further opportunities for cooperation and authentic dialogue between the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts with a view to raising the Committee of Experts' understanding of the practical issues facing employers and employers' organizations; and (vi) encouraging member States included in the preliminary list of 40 cases to supply information one month before the opening of the International Labour Conference to help the tripartite constituents prepare for the discussions in advance.

- 178. The Employer members also emphasized that the Committee of Experts should only in exceptional cases break the regular reporting cycle and where such a decision was taken it should be explained and justified. Furthermore, the Committee of Experts should elaborate on the reasons for the decision to double footnote a case and on its decision to designate it as a serious case. They regretted that no cases of progress had been discussed in the Conference Committee since 2013 and suggested that the Centenary of the ILO should be taken as an opportunity to include cases of progress among the 24 individual cases. As the Committee's conclusions represented tripartite consensus on compliance issues within member States, they should determine and outline the scope of corresponding technical assistance of the Office and follow-up missions. ACTRAV and ACT/EMP specialists should be involved in such follow-up in the respective countries with a view to achieving compliance, taking into account the needs of both employers' and workers' organizations. They looked forward to discussing all the abovementioned proposals at the forthcoming informal tripartite consultations on the working methods of the Committee.
- 179. Following the adoption of the outcome of the discussion of the General Survey, the Employer members recalled that working time was an issue that was subject to constant changes and required regular adaptation to new realities. In view of the diversity among member States, it was difficult to set international standards on working time. The organization of working time was of fundamental importance for the competitiveness, agility, productivity and sustainability of enterprises. Any regulation of working time therefore had to carefully balance both the protection needs of workers and the varying and evolving needs of enterprises. In conclusion, the Employer members highlighted that the ILO Centenary should constitute further impetus towards continuing to improve the effectiveness of the international labour standards system as a whole.
- 180. The Worker members welcomed the Committee's successful work, particularly the richness of the discussions and the quality of the contributions. The general discussion had provided the opportunity to recall that, in order to ensure the coherence and stability of the regular supervisory mechanisms, special attention should be given to the coordination of its bodies. They thus emphasized the need to ensure that the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee, the two pillars of the supervisory system, functioned independently, with mutual respect and a guarantee of dialogue. In that regard, they found it regrettable that the work of the Committee of Experts was often called into question during the discussions. They underlined that the Committee of Experts provided sufficiently detailed explanations in its report on the parameters of its mandate and the situations in which it was bound to decide to break the standard reporting cycle for a country. It was unacceptable that, in the course of its work, certain governments would intervene to cast doubt on the actions of the Committee of Experts or to raise the issue of the supposed manipulation of the Organization as a whole. They also recalled that the Committee's discussions should develop with respect, using parliamentary language.
- 181. The Worker members noted that certain governments continued to request explanations on the process of determining the list of individual cases or indicated that they did not understand the reasons for their inclusion in the list. They recalled that a dedicated information session, attended by the two Vice-Chairpersons of the Committee, was scheduled for the governments concerned immediately following the meeting for the adoption of the final list. Certain governments were not satisfied with those actions and demanded fuller participation in the governmental group in the preparation and establishment of the list of cases or in the drafting process for the Committee's conclusions. In that connection, the Worker members highlighted the need to ensure that such participation did not result in a situation where the governments were judge and jury. Moreover, the question of the Committee's independence would continuously be raised if the governments took decisions on the countries to keep on the list or the conclusions. They nevertheless underscored the place governments should hold in the Committee's work and called for their more active participation in the discussions. It was necessary that the governments concerned by the Committee's conclusions demonstrated goodwill and determination to give effect to those conclusions. Recalling the possibility to request technical assistance from the Office, they called for more resources for the Office to enable it to fulfil its mission in that regard.

- 182. Recalling the fundamental importance of the ILO instruments on working time, they welcomed the adoption of the joint conclusions on that subject and considered that it was vital to arrange a tripartite meeting of experts on working time shortly. While guaranteeing protection of workers' rights set forth in the instruments concerned, such a meeting could provide necessary clarification on legal aspects, and highlight the relevance of those instruments and the appropriate flexibility they could offer.
- 183. The Worker members expressed regret at noting, once again this year, the mutual support among certain governments not demonstrating exemplary compliance with international standards, which amounted to solidarity with respect to failures, which was contrary to the Organization's objectives. They also regretted certain interventions calling for the denouncement of Conventions being examined and the attitude of governments that had threatened to denounce ratified Conventions in an attempt to evade the supervision of the Organization. Recalling that the denouncement of ratified Conventions would not necessarily protect the governments concerned from the supervisory mechanisms, the Worker members highlighted that the ratification of a Convention entailed a government's commitment to other constituents and implied its acceptance of examination to ensure the fulfilment of such a commitment. With regard to the management of speaking time in discussions, they applauded the discipline that had been demonstrated by all speakers throughout the work. However, the limit to three minutes per speaker as of 17 speakers had been a constraint and applying a time limit per group, as they proposed, might be a solution. They welcomed the fact that the Committee had, once again, been able to adopt by consensus the conclusions on the cases, thus confirming its dynamism. Differences in viewpoints persisted between the Worker and Employer members on certain issues, such as the right to strike and its link with Convention No. 87. The Organization's composition accounted for the differences in opinions expressed. However, it was necessary to reaffirm and defend this particularity of the Organization, which united sometimes opposing interests and viewpoints around a shared objective.
- 184. The Chairperson thanked the Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Reporter and all Government, Employer and Worker members for their participation in the Committee's work and for the rich discussions generated by all. He referred to the importance of defending and valuing the legal instruments that were the foundations of the Organization, and the consensus reached in the discussions, despite the difficulties. Lastly, he thanked the secretariat for its consistent cooperation and support.

Committee on the Application of Standards

I. Introduction

This document (D.1) sets out the manner in which the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) is carried out. It is submitted to the Committee for adoption when it begins its work at each session of the Conference.<sup>1</sup> This document reflects the results of the discussions and informal tripartite consultations that have taken place, since 2002, on the working methods of the Committee, including on the following issues: the elaboration of the list of individual cases to be discussed by the Committee; the preparation and adoption of the conclusions relating to these individual cases; time management and respect for parliamentary rules of decorum.

This document takes into account the results of the last informal tripartite consultations on the working methods of the CAS held on 4 November 2017 and on 17 March 2018.

II. Terms of reference and composition of the Committee, voting procedure and report to the Conference

Under its terms of reference as defined in article 7, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Committee is called upon to consider:

- (a) the measures taken by Members to give effect to the provisions of Conventions to which they are parties and the information furnished by Members concerning the results of inspections;
- (b) the information and reports concerning Conventions and Recommendations communicated by Members in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution;
- (c) the measures taken by Members in accordance with article 35 of the Constitution.

In accordance with article 7, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Committee submits a report to the Conference. Since 2007, in response to the wishes expressed by ILO constituents, the report of the Committee has been published both in the Record of Proceedings of the Conference and as a separate publication, to improve the visibility of the Committee's work.

Questions related to the composition of the Committee, the right to participate in its work and the voting procedure are regulated by section H of Part II of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

Each year, the Committee elects its Officers: its Chairperson and Vice-Chairpersons, as well as its Reporter.

III. Working documents

A. Report of the Committee of Experts

The basic working document of the Committee is the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (Report III (Parts A and B)), printed in two volumes.

Report III (Part A) contains, in Part One, the General Report of the Committee of Experts, and in Part Two, the observations of the Committee of Experts concerning the sending of reports, the application of ratified Conventions and the obligation to submit the Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities in member States. At the beginning of the report there is an index of comments by Convention and by country. In addition to the observations contained in its report, the Committee of Experts has, as in previous years, made direct requests which are communicated to governments by the Office on the Committee's behalf.<sup>2</sup>

Report III (Part B) contains the General Survey prepared by the Committee of Experts on a group of Conventions and Recommendations decided upon by the Governing Body.

B. Summaries of reports

At its 267th Session (November 1996), the Governing Body approved new measures for rationalization and simplification of the arrangements for the presentation by the Director-General to the Conference of summaries of reports submitted by governments under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution.<sup>3</sup> Requests for consultation or copies of reports may be addressed to the secretariat of the CAS.

C. Other information

The secretariat prepares documents (which are referred to, and referenced, as "D documents") which are made available<sup>4</sup> during the course of the work of the Committee to provide the following information:

- (i) reports and information which have reached the International Labour Office since the last meeting of the Committee of Experts; based on this information, the list of governments which are invited to supply information to the Conference Committee due

<sup>3</sup> See report of the Committee of Experts, Report III (Part A), Appendices I, II, IV, V and VI; and Report III (Part B), Appendix III.

<sup>4</sup> D documents will be made available online on the Committee's dedicated web page (hard copies will be made available to delegates upon request).

to serious failure to respect their reporting and other standards-related obligations is updated;<sup>5</sup>

- (ii) written information supplied by governments to the Conference Committee in reply to the observations made by the Committee of Experts, when these governments are on the list of individual cases adopted by the Conference Committee.<sup>6</sup>

IV. General discussion

In accordance with its usual practice, the Committee begins its work with the consideration of its working methods on the basis of this document. The Committee then holds a discussion on general aspects of the application of Conventions and Recommendations and the discharge by member States of standards-related obligations under the ILO Constitution, which is primarily based on the General Report of the Committee of Experts.

It also holds a discussion on the General Survey, entitled Ensuring decent working time for the future. The General Survey concerns the 16 ILO instruments on working time and covers nine Conventions, one Protocol and six Recommendations. These are: the Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1); the Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14); the Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930 (No. 30); the Forty-Hour Week Convention, 1935 (No. 47); the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89); the Protocol of 1990 to the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948; the Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1957 (No. 106); the Holidays with Pay Convention (Revised), 1970 (No. 132); the Night Work Convention, 1990 (No. 171); the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (No. 175); the Night Work of Women (Agriculture) Recommendation, 1921 (No. 13); the Holidays with Pay Recommendation, 1954 (No. 98); the Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Recommendation, 1957 (No. 103); the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation, 1962 (No. 116); the Night Work Recommendation, 1990 (No. 178); and the Part-Time Work Recommendation, 1994 (No. 182).<sup>7</sup> The instruments on working time that have been determined to be outdated, have been shelved or withdrawn, are not included in the scope of the General Survey.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>7</sup> It should be recalled that the subjects of General Surveys have been aligned with the strategic objectives that are examined in the context of the recurrent discussions under the follow-up to the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization (2008). The discussion of General Surveys by the Committee will continue to be held one year in advance of the recurrent discussion under the new five-year cycle of recurrent discussions adopted by the Governing Body in November 2016. The full synchronization of General Surveys and their discussion by the Committee will be re-established under the new cycle in the context of the recurrent discussion on social protection (social security) to be held by the Conference in 2020 (see GB.328/INS/5/2 and GB.328/PV (paras 25 and 102)). It is also anticipated that the General Survey on working time will make a useful contribution to the work of both the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on working time and work–life balance tentatively planned for 2019 and of the Tripartite Working Group of the Standards Review Mechanism of the ILO Governing Body.

<sup>8</sup> In addition, certain sectorial instruments such as the Hours of Work and Rest Periods (Road Transport) Convention, 1979 (No. 153), and the Hours of Work and Rest Periods (Road Transport) Recommendation, 1979 (No. 161), are excluded from the scope of the General Survey.

V. Cases of serious failure by member States to respect their reporting and other standards-related obligations <sup>9</sup>

Governments are invited to supply information on cases of serious failure to respect reporting or other standards-related obligations for stated periods. These cases are considered in a dedicated sitting of the Committee. Governments that submit the required information before the sitting will not be called before the Committee. The discussion of the Committee, including any explanations of difficulties that may have been provided by the governments concerned, and the conclusions adopted by the Committee under each criterion are reflected in its report.

The Committee identifies the cases on the basis of criteria which are as follows: <sup>10</sup>

- None of the reports on ratified Conventions have been supplied during the past two years or more.
- First reports on ratified Conventions have not been supplied for at least two years.
- None of the reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations requested under article 19, paragraphs 5, 6 and 7, of the Constitution have been supplied during the past five years.
- No indication is available on whether steps have been taken to submit the instruments adopted during the last seven sessions of the Conference to the competent authorities, in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution. <sup>11</sup>
- No information has been received as regards all or most of the observations and direct requests of the Committee of Experts to which a reply was requested for the period under consideration.
- The government has failed during the past three years to indicate the representative organizations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution, copies of reports and information supplied to the Office have been communicated.

At its last session (November–December 2017), the Committee of Experts decided to institute a new practice of launching “urgent appeals” on cases corresponding to certain criteria of serious reporting failure<sup>12</sup> and to draw the attention of the Committee on the Application of Standards to these cases, so that governments can be called before the Conference Committee and thus advised that, in the absence of a report, the Committee of Experts might examine the substance of the matter at its next session. The Committee of Experts expressed the hope that this may further reinforce the synergies between the two supervisory bodies. This new practice is most likely to have an impact on the working methods of the Conference Committee as of the 108th Session of the ILC (2019) (see section VI concerning the adoption of conclusions).

VI. Individual cases

The Committee considers cases relating to the application of ratified Conventions. These cases are selected on the basis of the observations published in the report of the Committee of Experts.

Preliminary list. Since 2006, an early communication to governments of a preliminary list of individual cases for possible discussion by the Committee concerning the application of ratified Conventions has been instituted. Since 2015, the preliminary list of cases has been made available 30 days before the opening of the International Labour Conference. The preliminary list is a response to the requests from governments for early notification, so that they may better prepare themselves for a possible intervention before the Committee. It may not in any way be considered definitive, as the adoption of a final list is a function that only the Committee itself can assume.

Establishment of the list of cases. The list of individual cases is submitted to the Committee for adoption, after the Employers’ and Workers’ groups have met to discuss and adopt it. The final list should be adopted at the beginning of the Committee’s work, ideally no later than its second sitting.

<sup>12</sup> Based on the discussion that took place on the subcommittee on working methods, the Committee decided to institute a practice of launching “urgent appeals” to cases corresponding to the following criteria:

- failure to send first reports for the third consecutive year;
- failure to reply to serious and urgent observations from employers’ and workers’ organizations for more than two years;
- failure to reply to repetitions relating to draft legislation when developments have intervened.

In such cases, the Committee might inform the governments concerned that if they have not supplied a first report or answers to the points raised by 1 September of the following year, then it might proceed with the examination of these cases on the basis of the information at its disposal and possibly make a new comment at its next session (see paragraphs 9 and 10 of the General Report of the Committee of Experts (Report III (Part A), ILC, 107th Session, 2018)).

As of the revision in 2015 of the criteria for the selection of cases, the selection should take into consideration, on balance, the following elements:

- the nature of the comments of the Committee of Experts, in particular the existence of a footnote; *
- the quality and scope of responses provided by the government or the absence of a response on its part;
- the seriousness and persistence of shortcomings in the application of the Convention;
- the urgency of a specific situation;
- comments received by employers' and workers' organizations;
- the nature of a specific situation (if it raises a hitherto undiscussed question, or if the case presents an interesting approach to solving questions of application);
- the discussions and conclusions of the Conference Committee of previous sessions and, in particular, the existence of a special paragraph;
- the likelihood that discussing the case would have a tangible impact;
- balance between fundamental, governance and technical Conventions;
- geographical balance; and
- balance between developed and developing countries.

* See paras 50–52 of the General Report of the Committee of Experts. The criteria developed by the Committee of Experts for footnotes are also reproduced in Appendix I of this document.

There is also the possibility of examining one case of progress as was done in 2006, 2007, 2008 and 2013.<sup>13</sup>

Since 2007, it has been the practice to follow the adoption of the list of individual cases with an informal information session for governments, hosted by the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons, to explain the criteria used for the selection of individual cases.

Automatic registration. Since 2010, cases included in the final list have been automatically registered and scheduled by the Office, on the basis of a rotating alphabetical system, following the French alphabetical order; the “A+5” model has been chosen to ensure a genuine rotation of countries on the list. This year, the registration will begin with countries with the letter “O”. Cases will be divided into two groups: the first group of countries to be registered following the above alphabetical order will consist of those cases in which the Committee of Experts requested governments to submit full particulars to the Conference (“double-footnoted cases”).<sup>14</sup> Since 2012, the Committee begins its discussion of individual cases with these cases. The other cases on the final list are then registered by the Office also following the abovementioned alphabetical order.

<sup>13</sup> See paras 53–59 of the General Report of the Committee of Experts. The criteria developed by the Committee of Experts for identifying cases of progress are also reproduced in Appendix II of this document.

Information on the agenda of the Committee and the date on which cases may be heard is available:

- (a) through the Daily Bulletin and the Committee's dedicated web page;
- (b) by means of a D document containing the list of individual cases and the working schedule for the examination of these cases, which is made available to the Committee as soon as possible after the adoption of the list of cases.<sup>15</sup>

Supply of information. Prior to their oral intervention before the Conference Committee, governments may submit written information that will be summarized by the Office and made available to the Committee.<sup>16</sup> These written replies are to be provided to the Office at least two days before the discussion of the case. They serve to complement the oral reply that will be provided by the government. They may not duplicate the oral reply nor any other information already provided by the government. The total number of pages is not to exceed five pages.

Adoption of conclusions. The conclusions regarding individual cases are proposed by the Vice-Chairpersons and submitted by the Chairperson to the Committee for adoption. The conclusions should take due account of the elements raised in the discussion and information provided in writing by the government. The conclusions should be short, clear and specify the action expected of governments. They may also include reference to the technical assistance to be provided by the Office. The conclusions should reflect consensus recommendations. Divergent views can be reflected in the Committee's record of proceedings.

Conclusions on the cases discussed will be adopted at dedicated sittings. The government representatives concerned will be informed of the sitting for the adoption of the conclusions concerning their country by the secretariat through the Daily Bulletin and the web page of the Committee. The conclusions are made visible on a screen in the language being read out by the Chairperson, and at the same time a hard copy of these conclusions is provided to the government representative concerned in one of the three working languages, as requested by the government. The government representatives may take the floor after the Chairperson has announced the adoption of the conclusions.

As per the Committee's decision in 1980,<sup>17</sup> Part One of its report will contain a section entitled "Application of ratified Conventions", in which the Committee draws the attention of the Conference to: (i) cases of progress, where governments have introduced changes in their law and practice in order to eliminate divergences previously discussed by the Committee; (ii) certain special cases, which are mentioned in special paragraphs of the report; and (iii) cases of continued failure over several years to eliminate serious deficiencies in the application of ratified Conventions which it had previously discussed. As of 2019, this section of the report might also reflect "urgent appeals" following the decision of the Committee of Experts to institute a new practice in this regard (see section V).

VII. Participation in the work of the Committee

As regards failure by a government to take part in the discussion concerning its country, despite repeated invitations by the Committee, the following measures will be applied, in

conformity with the decision taken by the Committee at the 73rd Session of the Conference (1987), as amended at the 97th Session of the Conference (2008),<sup>18</sup> and mention will be made in the relevant part of the Committee's report:

- In accordance with the usual practice, after having established the list of cases regarding which Government delegates might be invited to supply information to the Committee, the Committee shall invite the governments of the countries concerned in writing, and the Daily Bulletin shall regularly mention these countries.
- Three days before the end of the discussion of individual cases, the Chairperson of the Committee shall request the Clerk of the Conference to announce every day the names of the countries whose representatives have not yet responded to the Committee's invitation, urging them to do so as soon as possible.
- On the last day of the discussion of individual cases, the Committee shall deal with the cases in which governments have not responded to the invitation. Given the importance of the Committee's mandate, assigned to it in 1926, to provide a tripartite forum for dialogue on outstanding issues relating to the application of ratified international labour Conventions, a refusal by a government to participate in the work of the Committee is a significant obstacle to the attainment of the core objectives of the International Labour Organization. For this reason, the Committee may discuss the substance of the cases concerning governments which are registered and present at the Conference, but which have chosen not to be present before the Committee. The debate which ensues in such cases will be reflected in the appropriate part of the report, concerning both individual cases and participation in the work of the Committee. In the case of governments that are not present at the Conference, the Committee will not discuss the substance of the case, but will draw attention in its report to the importance of the questions raised.<sup>19</sup> In both situations, a particular emphasis will be put on steps to be taken to resume the dialogue.

VIII. Minutes of the sittings

No minutes are published for the general discussion and the discussion of the General Survey. Minutes of sittings at which governments are invited to respond to the comments of the Committee of Experts will be produced by the secretariat. Each intervention will be reflected only in the corresponding working language – English, French or Spanish – and the draft minutes will be made available online on the Committee's dedicated web page (hard copies will be made available to delegates upon request).<sup>20</sup> It is the Committee's practice to accept amendments to the draft minutes of previous sittings prior to their approval by the Committee. The time available to delegates to submit amendments to the draft minutes

<sup>19</sup> In the case of a government which is not accredited or registered to the Conference, the Committee will not discuss the substance of the case, but will draw attention in its report to the importance of the questions raised. It was considered that no country should use inclusion on the preliminary list of individual cases as a reason for failing to ensure that it was accredited to the Conference. If a country on the preliminary list registered after the final list was approved, it should be asked to provide explanations (see Provisional Record No. 18, International Labour Conference, 100th Session, 2011, Part I/54).

<sup>20</sup> These new modalities result from the informal tripartite consultations of March 2016. Delegates who will be intervening in a language other than English, French or Spanish will be able to indicate to the secretariat in which of these three working languages their intervention should be reflected in the draft minutes.

will be clearly indicated by the Chairperson when they are made available to the Committee. The amendments should be clearly highlighted and submitted either electronically or in hard copy. Please refer to Appendix III or contact the secretariat in relation to the procedure for amendments to draft minutes and their electronic submission. In order to avoid delays in the preparation of the Committee's report, no amendments may be accepted once the draft minutes have been approved. The minutes are a summary of the discussions and are not intended to be a verbatim record. Speakers are therefore requested to restrict amendments to the elimination of errors in the report of their own statements, and not to ask to insert long additional passages.

Following the practice adopted last year, the second part of the report of the Committee which reflects the discussions of cases in which governments are invited to respond to the comments of the Committee of Experts will be submitted for adoption to the plenary session of the Conference in a single document reflecting the working language – English, French or Spanish – in which statements were delivered by the member of the Committee. Only the first – general – part of the report and the conclusions reached after the discussion of individual cases will be translated at that stage in all three languages for adoption.<sup>21</sup> The fully translated versions of the report will be made available online ten days following its adoption.

IX. Time management

- Every effort will be made so that sessions start on time and the schedule is respected.
- Maximum speaking time during the examination of individual cases will be as follows:
  - fifteen minutes for the government whose case is being discussed, as well as the spokespersons of the Workers' and the Employers' groups;
  - ten minutes for the Employer and Worker members, respectively, from the country concerned to be divided between the different speakers of each group;
  - ten minutes for Government groups;
  - five minutes for the other members;
  - concluding remarks are limited to ten minutes for the government whose case is being discussed, as well as spokespersons of the Workers' and the Employers' groups.
- Maximum speaking time will also apply to the discussion of the General Survey, as follows:<sup>22</sup>
  - fifteen minutes for the spokespersons of the Workers' and the Employers' groups;
  - ten minutes for Government groups;
  - five minutes for the other members;

- concluding remarks are limited to ten minutes for spokespersons of the Workers' and the Employers' groups.
  - However, the Chairperson, in consultation with the other Officers of the Committee, could decide on reduced time limits where the situation of a case would warrant it, for instance, where there was a very long list of speakers.
  - These time limits will be announced by the Chairperson at the beginning of each sitting and will be strictly enforced.
  - During interventions, a screen located behind the Chairperson and visible by all speakers will indicate the remaining time available to speakers. Once the maximum speaking time has been reached, the speaker will be interrupted.
  - The list of speakers will be visible on screens in the room. Early registration on that list of delegates intending to take the floor is encouraged.<sup>23</sup>
  - In view of the above limits on speaking time, governments whose case is to be discussed are invited to complete the information provided, where appropriate, by a written document, not longer than five pages, to be submitted to the Office at least two days before the discussion of the case.<sup>24</sup>

X. Respect of rules of decorum and role of the Chairperson

All delegates have an obligation to the Conference to abide by parliamentary language and by the generally accepted procedure. Interventions should be relevant to the subject under discussion and should avoid references to extraneous matters.

It is the role and task of the Chairperson to maintain order and to ensure that the Committee does not deviate from its fundamental purpose to provide an international tripartite forum for full and frank debate within the boundaries of respect and decorum essential to making effective progress towards the aims and objectives of the International Labour Organization.

Appendix I

Criteria developed by the Committee of Experts for footnotes

Excerpts of the General Report of the Committee of Experts (107 III(A))

45. As in the past, the Committee has indicated by special notes (traditionally known as “footnotes”) at the end of its comments the cases in which, because of the nature of the problems encountered in the application of the Conventions concerned, it has deemed appropriate to ask the government to supply a report earlier than would otherwise have been the case and, in some instances, to supply full particulars to the Conference at its next session in May–June 2018.

46. In order to identify cases for which it inserts special notes, the Committee uses the basic criteria described below, while taking into account the following general considerations. First, the criteria are indicative. In exercising its discretion in the application of the criteria, the Committee may also have regard to the specific circumstances of the country and the length of the reporting cycle. Second, the criteria are applicable to cases in which an earlier report is requested, often referred to as a “single footnote”, as well as to cases in which the government is requested to provide detailed information to the Conference, often referred to as a “double footnote”. The difference between these two categories is one of degree. Third, a serious case otherwise justifying a special note to provide full particulars to the Conference (double footnote) might only be given a special note to provide an early report (single footnote) when there has been a recent discussion of the case in the Conference Committee. Finally, the Committee wishes to point out that it exercises restraint in its recourse to “double footnotes” in deference to the Conference Committee’s decisions as to the cases it wishes to discuss.

47. The criteria to which the Committee has regard are the following:

- the seriousness of the problem; in this respect, the Committee emphasizes that an important consideration is the necessity to view the problem in the context of a particular Convention and to take into account matters involving fundamental rights, workers’ health, safety and well-being, as well as any adverse impact, including at the international level, on workers and other categories of protected persons;
- the persistence of the problem;
- the urgency of the situation; the evaluation of such urgency is necessarily case specific, according to standard human rights criteria, such as life threatening situations or problems where irreversible harm is foreseeable; and
- the quality and scope of the government’s response in its reports or the absence of response to the issues raised by the Committee, including cases of clear and repeated refusal on the part of a State to comply with its obligations.

48. In addition, the Committee wishes to emphasize that its decision not to double footnote a case which it has previously drawn to the attention of the Conference Committee in no way implies that it has considered progress to have been made therein.

49. At its 76th Session (November–December 2005), the Committee decided that the identification of cases in respect of which a government is requested to provide detailed information to the Conference would be a two-stage process: first, the expert initially responsible for a particular group of Conventions recommends to the Committee the insertion of special notes; second, in light of all the recommendations made, the Committee will, after discussion, take a final, collegial decision once it has reviewed the application of all the Conventions.

Appendix II

Criteria developed by the Committee of Experts for identifying cases of progress

Excerpts of the General Report of the Committee of Experts (107 III(A))

53. Following its examination of the reports supplied by governments, and in accordance with its standard practice, the Committee refers in its comments to cases in which it expresses its satisfaction or interest at the progress achieved in the application of the respective Conventions.

54. At its 80th and 82nd Sessions (2009 and 2011), the Committee made the following clarifications on the general approach developed over the years for the identification of cases of progress:

- (1) The expression by the Committee of interest or satisfaction does not mean that it considers that the country in question is in general conformity with the Convention, and in the same comment the Committee may express its satisfaction or interest at a specific issue while also expressing regret concerning other important matters which, in its view, have not been addressed in a satisfactory manner.
- (2) The Committee wishes to emphasize that an indication of progress is limited to a specific issue related to the application of the Convention and the nature of the measures adopted by the government concerned.
- (3) The Committee exercises its discretion in noting progress, taking into account the particular nature of the Convention and the specific circumstances of the country.
- (4) The expression of progress can refer to different kinds of measures relating to national legislation, policy or practice.
- (5) If the satisfaction relates to the adoption of legislation, the Committee may also consider appropriate follow-up measures for its practical application.
- (6) In identifying cases of progress, the Committee takes into account both the information provided by governments in their reports and the comments of employers' and workers' organizations.

55. Since first identifying cases of satisfaction in its report in 1964,<sup>1</sup> the Committee has continued to follow the same general criteria. The Committee expresses satisfaction in cases in which, following comments it has made on a specific issue, governments have taken measures through either the adoption of new legislation, an amendment to the existing legislation or a significant change in the national policy or practice, thus achieving fuller compliance with their obligations under the respective Conventions. In expressing its satisfaction, the Committee indicates to governments and the social partners that it considers the specific matter resolved. The reason for identifying cases of satisfaction is twofold:

- to place on record the Committee's appreciation of the positive action taken by governments in response to its comments; and
- to provide an example to other governments and social partners which have to address similar issues.

58. Within cases of progress, the distinction between cases of satisfaction and cases of interest was formalized in 1979.<sup>2</sup> In general, cases of interest cover measures that are sufficiently advanced to justify the expectation that further progress would be achieved in the future and regarding which the Committee would want to continue its dialogue with the government and the social partners. The Committee's practice has developed to such an extent that cases in which it expresses interest may encompass a variety of measures. The paramount consideration is that the measures contribute to the overall achievement of the objectives of a particular Convention. This may include:

- draft legislation that is before parliament, or other proposed legislative changes forwarded or available to the Committee;
- consultations within the government and with the social partners;
- new policies;
- the development and implementation of activities within the framework of a technical cooperation project or following technical assistance or advice from the Office;
- judicial decisions, according to the level of the court, the subject matter and the force of such decisions in a particular legal system, would normally be considered as cases of interest unless there is a compelling reason to note a particular judicial decision as a case of satisfaction; or
- the Committee may also note as cases of interest the progress made by a state, province or territory in the framework of a federal system.

Appendix III

Procedure for amendments to draft minutes

With reference to Part VIII of document C.App./D.1, this note provides information on the new procedure for amendments to draft minutes (PVs), taking into account the fact that, since 2016, each intervention is reflected in the draft PVs only in the corresponding working language<sup>1</sup> – English, French or Spanish – and the draft PVs will be made available online on the Committee’s dedicated web page.<sup>2</sup>

It is recalled that the Committee’s practice is to accept amendments to the draft PVs of previous sittings prior to their approval by the Committee. The time available to delegates to submit amendments to the draft PVs will be clearly indicated by the Chairperson when the draft PVs are made available to the Committee.

Delegates are encouraged to submit their amendments to the secretariat electronically in “track changes” via the following email address: AMEND-PVCAS@ilo.org. In order to make amendments directly in track changes, delegates are invited to request the “Word version” of the minute by sending an email to the address above.

Amendments will be received only if they are sent from the email address which will have been provided by the delegate concerned when requesting the floor. The secretariat will acknowledge receipt of the amendment and may contact the delegate concerned when the request does not fulfil the requirements contained in document C.App./D.1, which read as follows: Minutes are a summary of the discussions and are not intended to be a verbatim record. Delegates are requested to restrict amendments to the elimination of errors in the report of their own statements, and not to ask to insert long additional passages. Delegates should specify the draft PV concerned and make clearly visible the changes they wish to make.

Delegates who wish to submit hard copies of their amendments will still be able to do so from 1.30 p.m. to 2.30 p.m. each day, in Office No. 6-140. The secretariat will verify that the request fulfils the requirements reproduced above. Delegates will therefore need to show their identification badge.

<sup>1</sup> When filling in a request for the floor, delegates will be requested to indicate in which working language (English, French or Spanish) their intervention should be reflected in the draft PVs, if this intervention is not in one of these three languages. They will also be requested to provide an email address and a phone number.

A. DISCUSSION OF CASES OF SERIOUS FAILURE BY MEMBER STATES TO RESPECT THEIR REPORTING OR OTHER STANDARDS-RELATED OBLIGATIONS, INCLUDING SUBMISSION TO THE COMPETENT AUTHORITIES OF THE INSTRUMENTS ADOPTED BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

The Worker members said that it was essential to maintain the special sitting, which highlighted the large number of countries which did not respect their constitutional obligations. These failures endangered the smooth functioning of the ILO supervisory system. The sitting provided the occasion to invite countries that were not respecting their obligations to do so. Of all the reports requested from governments, only 38.2 per cent had been received on time, compared with 39.9 per cent the previous year. Governments should therefore be encouraged to submit their reports within the time limits to avoid disruption to the smooth functioning of the supervisory procedure. The reduction in the number of reports received by comparison with the previous year was continuing since for the last session of the Committee of Experts they amounted to only 67.8 per cent compared with 71.1 per cent for the previous session, in other words 3.3 per cent less. Moreover, 15 countries had not supplied the reports due for at least two years and 13 countries had not submitted first reports for at least two years. First reports that were due following a ratification were very important since they enabled an initial evaluation of the application of the Conventions concerned. In addition, 43 countries had not replied to the observations and direct requests made by the Committee of Experts. Such failure had an adverse impact on the work of the supervisory bodies. They invited the defaulting governments to send all the requested information. The production of General Surveys was also based on the reports supplied by member States. It was therefore crucial that the latter send their reports to allow an overview of the application of ILO instruments in law and in practice, even in countries which had not ratified the Conventions concerned. The Worker members had noted that 38 countries had not supplied any information during the last five years for the purposes of the General Surveys produced by the Committee of Experts. This was regrettable since these States would otherwise have contributed to the General Survey. The Worker members expressed concern at these figures and called for the positive initiatives already taken by the Office to ensure better monitoring of the countries where there had been serious failure to meet constitutional obligations to be strengthened in order to reverse the negative trend observed this year.

Under the ILO Constitution, member States were obliged to indicate the representative organizations of workers and employers to which copies of the reports on ratified Conventions had been sent. The report of the Committee of Experts indicated that two countries had not met this obligation. The Worker members reminded these two States that tripartism was the cornerstone of the ILO and that it was essential that the social partners be involved in the supervision of the application of international labour standards in their countries. With regard to cases of serious failure to submit, these were the cases in which governments had not submitted the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities for at least seven sessions of the Committee of Experts. Yet this obligation was essential to ensure tripartite participation at national level in the ILO standards-setting process. This year, 31 countries were in a situation of serious failure to submit. For this reason, the Worker members called on all member countries invited to the present sitting to duly note the serious failures to respect their constitutional obligations and to rectify them as soon as possible. In conclusion, the Worker members appealed to the Office to give fresh impetus to the process by calling for replies and reports from States through dialogue between the ILO supervisory bodies and the member States. This always constituted a vital exercise, just as it had done in the past, to ensure the effective application of international labour standards.

The Employer members recalled that the functioning of the ILO supervisory system was based primarily on the information provided by governments in their reports. Compliance with reporting obligations was therefore crucial for an appropriate and effective supervision of ILO standards. The number of reports under article 22 of the ILO Constitution which had been received by 1 September 2017 remained low, and the number of instances in which no information had been supplied in reply to comments made by the Committee of Experts continued to be high. They regretted that, despite all efforts, it had not been possible to achieve visible progress on these long-standing issues. Submissions by workers' and employers' organizations could add to the factual basis and provide a reality check, but could not replace government reports. While the Office, within its existing financial and human resources capacities, should continue to provide assistance to governments in meeting these obligations, reporting was ultimately a government responsibility. It was the decision of governments to ratify Conventions, and ratification entailed reporting obligations. The Employer members noted with concern that none of the reports due had been sent for the past two or more years by 15 countries. Furthermore, 61 of the 95 first reports due had been received by the time the Committee of Experts' session had ended, and 13 member States had failed for two or more years to supply a first report, albeit the basis for a timely dialogue between the Committee of Experts and the member State on the application of the ratified Convention. They encouraged the governments concerned to request technical assistance from the Office and submit the first reports without delay. The Employer members welcomed the decision taken by the Committee of Experts, following a proposal made by the Employer members, to institute the practice of launching "urgent appeals" on cases corresponding to certain criteria of serious reporting failure and to draw the attention of the Conference Committee to these cases, so that governments could be called before the Conference Committee and, in the absence of a report, the Committee of Experts might examine the substance of the matter at its next session. With respect to reports under article 19 of the ILO Constitution, 38 countries had not sent reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations for the past five years, despite their importance for the comprehensiveness of General Surveys. As to the submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities, the Employer members noted with concern that 31 member States had failed to meet this constitutional obligation, while welcoming the efforts made by the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Guinea, Jamaica and Mozambique to overcome the delays in submission.

The obligation of member States to communicate copies of the reports supplied to the ILO to the representative employers' and workers' organizations was key for the implementation of tripartism at the national level. The social partners had submitted 1,325 observations under article 23, 330 of which (compared to 314 last year) had been communicated by employers' organizations. The Employer members trusted that the Office would step up efforts to encourage governments to respect this obligation and continue to provide technical assistance and capacity building to the social partners. Employers' organizations, with the invaluable support of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), were working to contribute to the supervisory system in a more effective manner by submitting up-to-date and relevant information to the Committee of Experts. The Employer members highlighted that member States needed to take their reporting obligations seriously. Part of the discussion on cases of serious reporting failure touched upon the question of the high number and relevance of existing ILO standards. The present efforts to streamline reporting, including extending the possibilities for e-reporting, would help facilitate reporting and increase the reporting rate. Nonetheless, more fundamental steps were needed. A significant consolidation, concentration and simplification of ILO standards was a prerequisite for effective reporting. This had already been achieved to a significant extent in the field of maritime labour standards, and the work of the Standards Review Mechanism would hopefully lead to similar progress in other areas.

A Government representative of Angola said that the reports had been submitted to the Council of Ministers. However, the Council of Ministers had asked for the reports to be translated into Portuguese. He wished to take the opportunity to request the Office to provide technical assistance in order to resolve the issue.

A Government representative of the Bahamas stated that her Government would request ILO technical assistance so that the situation concerning the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authority could be rectified.

A Government representative of Bahrain noted that the Government had sent a written response to the ILO concerning the comments of the Committee of Experts on the failure to submit instruments to the competent authorities. He underscored that the Kingdom of Bahrain had complied with its obligations in this regard, in accordance with the constitutional requirements and domestic regulations regarding the submission of instruments to the competent authorities (the Council of Ministers). He requested the Committee to take that into account. With regard to the submission of instruments to the National Assembly (Parliament), he noted that the Government would examine the matter, and take the necessary measures, in accordance with domestic legislation.

A Government representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo indicated that the observations of the Committee of Experts had been taken into account in the drafting of the various government reports. The reports would be sent to the ILO before the end of the Conference. In order to avoid any delay in the provision of information in response to the comments of the Committee of Experts, the Government requested ILO technical assistance to strengthen the capacities of the personnel responsible for preparing reports.

A Government representative of El Salvador welcomed the technical cooperation received from the ILO for the preparation of the protocol of institutional procedures for the submission of ILO Conventions and Recommendations. The first part of the protocol had already been completed. For over 40 years, this obligation in respect of international labour standards had been omitted from the processes, customs and standards of the competent institutions. As a result, a review had been commenced to determine the relevant competences for the implementation of the process. Her Government would soon take the first steps for the submission of the relevant Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities, which would allow it to fulfil its obligations in the near future.

A Government representative of the United Arab Emirates said that her country was committed to complying with its obligations to the ILO and that it regularly submitted the reports requested. Given that the questionnaires concerned were long and complex and required information and data to be collected from several bodies, there had been a delay in submitting reports by the deadlines set. While hoping that the questionnaires would be simplified in future, the Government would do its utmost to submit the reports requested by the deadline.

A Government representative of Haiti said that his country was aware of the alleged delay in the submission of its reports on ratified Conventions. Owing to several natural disasters and the electoral crisis, the country had had other priorities in recent years, such as reconstruction and economic recovery. The Government reiterated its commitment to respecting its international obligations. In that regard, measures and provisions had been put in place by the Ministry of Labour with a view to getting the country's reporting cycle back on track. Given the large number of pending reports, the Government renewed its request for ILO technical assistance in that regard.

A Government representative of Ireland indicated that her country fully supported the work of the ILO and acknowledged the importance of reports submitted under article 19 of the ILO Constitution. Regretting the Government's failure to supply reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations, she stated that procedures had been put in place to address the matter and prevent any recurrence. The report concerning social protection floors would be submitted in the course of the present month. To illustrate the value attributed to the ILO's reporting processes, she highlighted the efforts made to prepare the report on the effective and sustained suppression of all forms of forced labour, as part of the follow-up to the Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, which was being used as a basis for the well-advanced work towards the ratification of the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930. In this regard, following the conclusion of consultations with the social partners and other stakeholders, the stage of seeking government approval for ratification had been attained.

A Government representative of Kiribati indicated that her Government had been experiencing staff turnover for the past few years. Technical assistance from the ILO had been received, and one staff member from the Government had been trained at the International Training Center of the ILO in Turin. She hoped that her Government would have the capacity to report as required.

A Government representative of Liberia reaffirmed the sustained commitment of her country to the obligations under articles 19 and 22 of the ILO Constitution. The Government was working actively to submit the outstanding reports in due course, in consultation with the relevant stakeholders, and with the technical assistance of the ILO.

A Government representative of Malaysia indicated that challenges were faced that caused non-compliance with the obligations referred to, not only at the regional level (Malaysia–Peninsular Malaysia, Malaysia–Sabah, Malaysia–Sarawak), but also at the federal level. Steps had been taken to foster engagement between the agencies and ministries involved in matters relating to labour standards, such as workshops and meetings, and to address the issues regarding reporting obligations. Technical assistance had been requested from the ILO Regional Office for Asia and the Pacific, based in Bangkok, Thailand, and the ILO project office to consult on a Decent Work Country Programme. His Government was committed to complying with obligations related to international labour standards and would expedite the supply of reports on the application of ratified Conventions during the required period between 1 June and 1 September.

A Government representative of Jamaica indicated that her Government would make the necessary arrangements to complete outstanding reports with the technical assistance of the ILO. Internal procedures were being conducted to submit eight reports in the very near future.

A Government representative of Malawi stated that her Government was working to ensure that all the comments raised by the Committee of Experts were responded to. The necessary action was being taken to that effect. In this respect, some reports had already been submitted to the Office during the current session of the International Labour Conference.

A Government representative of Mozambique noted that, during the period 1999 to 2017, her Government had submitted the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the ILO to the Assembly of the Republic. Concerning the observations in paragraph 34 of the General Report, her Government was preparing the relevant information and would provide it the following day.

A Government representative of Nicaragua said that her country was committed to fulfilling its obligations regarding the submission of reports and the implementation of ILO principles in general. With regard to the failure to submit the first report on the application of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006), the delay was due to the fact that the competent authorities were currently holding discussions and consultations, with the participation of the social partners and other interested parties. Once the process had been completed, the relevant report would be sent.

A Government representative of the Netherlands (Curaçao) indicated that the Government of the Netherlands was in contact with the Government of Curaçao to ensure the timely submission of the information requested. He reiterated his Government's commitment to ILO Conventions and to related reporting obligations.

A Government representative of Pakistan indicated that, thanks to ILO technical assistance, the exercise of submitting the outstanding 36 instruments to the competent authority had been completed. The relevant report would be communicated to the competent ministry in due course, and subsequently sent to Cabinet.

A Government representative of Serbia indicated that her Government apologized for not submitting the first report on the application of the Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94), ratified in 2014. The report should have been submitted in 2016. The underlying reason had been the serious lack of capacity, including administrative capacity, of the institutions responsible for preparing the report. A general election had been held since the ratification of the Convention, followed by changes in Cabinet, including inter-institutional staff movements. The Ministry of Construction, Transportation and Infrastructure had temporarily not been in a position to prepare the report. Improvements in the situation had occurred since November 2017, and the preparation of the first report on the application of the Convention had been resumed in April 2018. The report would be submitted by 1 September 2018.

A Government representative of Singapore stated that seven out of 16 reporting requests had been responded to. The Government would fulfil the remaining reporting requests by the end of the year and was committed to continue meeting its constitutional obligations.

A Government representative of South Sudan underlined her Government's commitment to meet its constitutional obligations. She highlighted the need for ILO technical assistance to be able to meet the reporting requests.

A Government representative of Eswatini (formerly known as Swaziland) indicated that his Government sincerely apologized to the Committee of Experts for its failure to supply reports as expected. Serious constraints were being faced, such as the shortage of personnel and capacity gaps. On this matter, ILO technical assistance had been requested and was being received, including the training the previous month of one staff member from the Government at the International Training Centre of the ILO in Turin. His Government pledged to comply with its obligations in the future.

A Government representative of Yemen indicated that his country had been in a situation of conflict since March 2015, which had widely affected the capacity of its institutions. While being committed to its constitutional obligations, he asked the Committee to take into consideration that the current circumstances and capacities did not allow for reporting.

The Worker members expressed regret that not all of the 69 countries invited to appear before the Committee had indicated their presence. With some 20 countries having supplied information to the Committee, they noted the difficulties encountered by certain governments, including with regard to the issue of languages. They also noted the need for specific information and asked the Office to take action in conjunction with the Turin Centre to ensure that courses were provided for those who requested them. Moreover, the Worker members reiterated their request to the Office to ensure ongoing, attentive action with regard to governments by providing them with all necessary assistance to enable them to discharge their constitutional obligations. While thanking governments which had provided additional information on their constitutional obligations, they expected coherent monitoring of the commitments made and appealed to all governments to provide the requested information as quickly as possible.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the information provided and the explanations given by the Government representatives who had taken the floor. The Committee noted in particular the specific difficulties referred to by certain governments in complying with their constitutional obligations to transmit reports and to submit to the competent authorities the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference. The Committee has periodically recalled that the ILO is able to provide technical assistance to contribute to compliance in this respect.

Concerning the failure to supply reports for the past two or more years on the application of ratified Conventions

The Committee recalls that the submission of reports on the application of ratified Conventions is a fundamental constitutional obligation and the basis of the system of supervision. The Committee also stresses the importance of respecting the deadlines for such submission.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Governments of the Cook Islands, Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Gambia, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Malaysia – Sabah, Saint Lucia, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Timor-Leste and Vanuatu will supply the reports due as soon as possible, and decides to note these cases in the corresponding paragraph of its General Report.

The Committee recalls the particular importance of supplying first reports on the application of ratified Conventions.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Governments of Belize, Comoros, Congo, Cook Islands, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Guyana, Republic of Maldives, Nicaragua, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Serbia and Somalia will supply the first reports due as soon as possible, and decides to note these cases in the corresponding paragraph of its General Report.

Concerning the failure to supply information in reply to comments made by the Committee of Experts

The Committee underlines the fundamental importance of clear and complete information in response to the comments of the Committee of Experts to permit a continued dialogue with the governments concerned.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Governments of Barbados, Belize, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Chad, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Gambia, Grenada, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Jamaica, Kyrgyzstan, Kiribati, Liberia, Malaysia, Malaysia (Peninsular Malaysia, Sabah and Sarawak), Malawi, Mozambique, Netherlands (Curaçao), Papua New Guinea, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Saint Lucia, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Timor-Leste, Trinidad and Tobago, Vanuatu and Yemen will supply the requested information in the future, and decides to note these cases in the corresponding paragraph of its General Report.

Concerning the failure to supply reports for the past five years on unratified Conventions and Recommendations

The Committee stresses the importance it attaches to the constitutional obligation to supply reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Governments of Afghanistan, Angola, Armenia, Belize, Botswana, Chad, Congo, Cook Islands, Dominica, Eswatini, Grenada, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Ireland, Kiribati, Liberia, Libya, Republic of Maldives, Marshall Islands, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, South Sudan, Timor-Leste, Tonga, Tuvalu, United Arab Emirates, Vanuatu and Yemen will comply with their obligation to supply reports on non-ratified Conventions and Recommendations in the future. The Committee decides to note these cases in the corresponding paragraph of its General Report.

Concerning the failure to submit instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities

The Committee recalls that compliance with the obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to national competent authorities is a requirement of the highest importance in ensuring the effectiveness of the Organization's standards-related activities.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Governments of Azerbaijan, Bahamas, Bahrain, Belize, Comoros, Croatia, Dominica, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Fiji, Gabon, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Kyrgyzstan, Kiribati, Kuwait, Liberia, Libya, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Samoa, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Syrian Arab Republic, Somalia and Vanuatu will comply with their obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent authorities in the future. The Committee decides to note these cases in the corresponding paragraph of its General Report.

Concerning the failure for the past three years to indicate the representative organizations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution, copies have been communicated of the reports and information supplied to the Office

The Committee recalls that compliance with the obligation of Governments to communicate reports and information, as provided in article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution, is a fundamental requirement in order to ensure the participation of employers' and workers' organizations in the ILO supervisory machinery.

The Committee recalls that the contribution of employers' and workers' organizations is essential for the assessment of the application of Conventions in national law and practice.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Governments of the Plurinational State of Bolivia and Rwanda will comply with this obligation in future. The Committee decides to note these cases in the corresponding paragraph of the General Report.

Overall, the Committee expresses deep concern at the large number of cases of failure by member States to respect their reporting and other standards-related obligations. The Committee recalls that Governments may request technical assistance from the Office to overcome their difficulties in this respect.

B. INFORMATION AND DISCUSSION ON THE APPLICATION OF RATIFIED CONVENTIONS (INDIVIDUAL CASES)

The Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) has adopted short, clear and straightforward conclusions. Conclusions identify what is expected from governments to apply ratified Conventions in a clear and unambiguous way. Conclusions reflect concrete steps to address compliance issues. Conclusions should be read with the full minutes of the discussion of an individual case. Conclusions do not repeat elements of the discussion or reiterate government declarations which can be found in the opening and closing of the discussion set out in the Record of Proceedings. The CAS has adopted conclusions on the basis of consensus. The CAS has only reached conclusions that fall within the scope of the Convention being examined. If the Workers, Employers and/or Governments had divergent views, this has been reflected in the CAS Record of Proceedings, not in the conclusions.

HAITI (ratifications: 1952, 1952, 1952 and 1958)

A Government representative assured the Committee of the full and complete cooperation of the Haitian delegation, emphasizing his appreciation of the work of the ILO supervisory bodies, which were a source of inspiration and a reference for States in relation to labour standards. The Government had noted the comments of the Committee of Experts on the application by Haiti of the working time Conventions that had been ratified. With reference to the national context, he recalled that in recent years the country had suffered many natural disasters and political crises, which had had an impact on the regular operation of the institutions responsible for the formulation and implementation of the State's social policy, and especially the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour (MAST). At the economic level, the situation was precarious, with an official unemployment rate of nearly 35 per cent of the active population and falling economic growth. The Government that had been in office since May 2017 had set as its specific objectives mass job creation to combat unemployment, national economic recovery, the reinforcement of social dialogue, the achievement of the objectives of sustainable development and the promotion of social justice, as set out in the ILO Constitution. For that purpose, emphasis had been placed on the subcontracting sector, which was vital for the national economy. It was with a view to the rapid promotion of mass job creation that Parliament had adopted in 2017 an Act to organize and regulate work over a period of 24 hours divided into three eight-hour segments. Through the Act, the Government intended to adapt the labour situation to contemporary realities. While establishing the principle of the eight-hour working day and the 48-hour week, the Act permitted, where necessary, through agreement between the employer and the employee, and in accordance with national and international labour standards, the normal eight-hour day to be exceeded, without the total number of hours worked exceeding 48 in a week. The eight-hour day remained the centrepiece of Haitian working time legislation. The system of three time segments introduced in all sectors had only been designed with a view to increasing the dynamism of the national economy and strengthening production through the availability of machines, which could create a greater number of jobs and employment for the benefit of the population as a whole. In principle, the Act took into account the protection, health and safety of workers within the spirit of the Conventions ratified by Haiti. By placing the responsibility upon employers of ensuring the good health and recuperation of workers, and by requiring enterprises to make available to them health and catering services in accordance with the law, the Haitian legislator had established safeguards which would be supplemented by regulations with a view to improving the protection and safeguarding workers against any form of abusive exploitation. Having taken due note of the observations of the Committee of Experts and the social partners, the Government was prepared to continue the discussions in a tripartite framework with ILO assistance with a view to identifying an agreed working-time regime adapted to the reality in Haiti. With reference to labour inspection, the Government recognized the importance of a competent body of labour inspectors in ensuring effective compliance with the provisions of the Labour Code. For that purpose, efforts had been made and cooperation with the ILO had made it possible to reinforce the capacities of the labour inspection services, which currently had seven stable inspectors and around 40 resource persons who occasionally fulfilled the functions of inspectors and conciliators. A project for a "call centre" to facilitate the reception of individual complaints from anyone who might have been a victim in their workplace had been delayed by a series of practical requirements related to confidentiality and the reliability of the services provided by local telephone operators. Several programmes coordinated by the ILO were making a useful contribution in the country, such as the Better Work Programme and the Employment Intensive Investment Programme (EIIP). However, despite the Government's efforts, the country was still fragile and cooperation projects needed to be designed and executed with a view to having a lasting impact on the population. They should be aimed at the strengthening of social dialogue and the rapid creation of decent sustainable jobs to generate income for the most underprivileged population categories. For these reasons, the Government called for the strengthening of ILO cooperation on such fundamental issues as social protection, action to combat child labour, vocational training and other relevant subjects which lay within the competence of the Organization. The Government considered that social dialogue was a fundamental element in pursuing the objectives of peace and economic growth. The encouragement of the social partners to resolve disputes through peaceful means remained a priority of the Government, which welcomed the conclusion of an agreement in March 2018 between the six principal workers' organizations in the country and the employers. The Government also noted the significant number of reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations which were due from Haiti. Measures were being taken at the level of the relevant body with a view to fulfilling these international obligations as rapidly as possible. ILO technical assistance would be requested on that specific issue. Finally, he emphasized that there was no intention by the Government to be in violation of the ILO Conventions to which Haiti was a party, including the working-time instruments. The difficulties that arose in relation to the 2017 Act would be addressed by the Government through tripartite discussions. The agreement reached between unions and employers in March 2018 offered a solid basis for such initiatives.

The Employer members first noted that it would be helpful if the Committee of Experts provided a clear indication on why cases were double-footnoted. They considered that this case, which concerned the adoption of the Act organizing and regulating work over a 24-hour period divided into three segments of eight hours (Act on working time), was timely as it took place two days after the discussion of the 2018 General Survey on working time instruments. Working time was an issue subject to constant changes and requiring regular adaptation to new realities. Enhancements in technology and communications were changing the traditional time and space dimensions at work, and the organization of working time was of fundamental importance for productivity, performance, competitiveness, sustainability and the ability to create jobs by enterprises. With regard to Conventions Nos 1 and 30 on hours of work, they referred to the 2005 General Survey on hours of work, according to which: “Conventions Nos 1 and 30 do not fully reflect modern realities in the regulation of working time. In fact, there are elements of the Conventions that are clearly outdated. ... In general, these two instruments are viewed by an increasing number of countries as prescribing overly rigid standards. The ‘fixed’ working hours system adopted by both Conventions as a cornerstone for the regulation of working time conflicts with today’s demands for more flexibility.” With regard to Conventions Nos 14 and 106 on weekly rest, these had been considered by the ILO Governing Body as up to date and were more widely ratified. This was particularly the case for Convention No. 14 which was a relatively flexible instrument in that it allowed almost unconditioned total or partial exceptions to the normal weekly rest day, as well as exceptions to compensation where it was not possible to grant the weekly rest days. On the other hand, Convention No. 106 allowed exceptions to weekly rest under much stricter conditions and did not foresee exceptions regarding the provision of compensation. They noted that, as the decree of application of the Act on working time had not yet been published, the articles of the Labour Code regarding working time continued to apply in the country. They encouraged the Government to ensure that working time regulation was discussed in the framework of the comprehensive reform of the Labour Code with a view to ensuring conformity with ratified Conventions. They considered that, in the event that the new and emerging realities of the labour market in Haiti required a change in legislation that went against the provisions of the Conventions in question, the Government should consider denouncing these Conventions to avoid a lack of conformity with its international obligations. Finally, they noted with deep concern that, for the fifth consecutive year, the reports due on all ratified Conventions had not been received. They urged the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance before 1 September 2018, with a view to submitting without delay the reports due to the Committee of Experts, including on Conventions Nos 1, 14, 30 and 106.

The Worker members recalled that the issue of working time lay at the heart of the employment relationship and was addressed in the founding treaty of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia, which proclaimed that work was not a commodity. The establishment of decent limits to working time preserved the dignity of workers and allowed them to find meaning in their occupational activity. The question of working time gave rise to several major challenges for workers, such as their purchasing power, the reconciliation of work and private life, security, health and well-being. It was fundamental for clear and strict regulations on working time to be adopted and strictly enforced in order to be able to guarantee decent work. The tripartite partners in the ILO had always been convinced of the need for the regulation of working time. It was for that reason that the Organization had adopted many instruments setting certain limits on working time. The Committee needed to ensure that member States made every effort to give effect to those standards. In the case under examination, the Government had gone beyond certain limits set out in the international labour standards on working time. The various measures taken had had the effect of increasing working time in practice and departed from the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation, 1962 (No. 116). In Haiti, a large proportion of the population was seeking employment and the introduction of reforms intended to lengthen the working time of workers who were already active would not promote the effective distribution of the work that was available. The recent legislative reform had repealed provisions regulating exceptions from the principles of the eight-hour day, normal working hours and the provision of weekly rest of 24 consecutive hours, to be given in preference on Sunday and at the same time for all workers in the same establishment. As a result of these various measures, Haitian legislation was no longer in conformity with the Conventions that had been ratified. The new legislation also provided that an employer and a worker could agree to exceptions at the individual level from the principle of the eight-hour working day, without specifying the maximum daily working time, and that workers negotiated their hours of work on an individual basis. As the employment relationship was fundamentally asymmetric, it was essential for provisions on working time to be negotiated collectively, not individually. Moreover, the absence of a framework to limit possible exceptions to normal working hours led to the belief that overtime could be carried out without due reason or limits, contrary to the provisions of Conventions Nos 1 and 30. That would compromise the objective of Recommendation No. 116 to achieve a social standard of the 40-hour week. The new legislation also had the effect that unions no longer needed to be consulted and that the Labour Department of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour no longer had to give authorization on a number of issues relating to possible exceptions to working time provisions. That was in violation of the provisions of Conventions Nos 1 and 30. With reference to the lack of resources of the labour inspection services, the Worker members recalled that Conventions Nos 30 and 106 provided that States shall adopt appropriate measures to ensure the effective enforcement of the rules on working time through adequate inspection. They added that Haiti had also ratified the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). The Government therefore needed to ensure that the inspection services had adequate personnel and that inspectors received appropriate training on working-time issues and were allocated sufficient financial and material resources. The development of statistics was also essential so as to be able to target sectors where abuses were likely in relation to working time. Noting that the great majority of economic activity in Haiti was in the informal economy, where workers were particularly exposed to abuses, the Worker members emphasized that it was necessary to ensure that the inspection services had the competence to enforce the legislation on working time in the informal economy. In the case of workers in export processing zones (EPZs), although they generally benefited from more formal employment relationships, they were also subject to many abuses. EPZs were an important source of employment in the country and it was necessary to ensure compliance with working-time regulations in such zones. It was to be regretted that the reform of the working-time provisions had been undertaken without any consultation of representative unions and outside the process of the global reform of the Labour Code that was currently being undertaken with ILO assistance, and which the Government had undertaken to finalize by July 2015 within the framework of the Decent Work Country Programme covering the period 2015–20. The new working-time legislation had been adopted to general surprise by Parliament in a night sitting.

Nor did the reform take into account in any way the agreement that had been obtained in the context of the overall reform of the Labour Code, which had now ground to a standstill. It was therefore necessary to reaffirm that social dialogue and collective bargaining had a fundamental role to play in the development of working-time rules that were supported by the social partners and, through them, a large part of society. The reform, which had been forced through by the Government and approved unilaterally by a fringe of employers' organizations, was not supported by the workers. Attempts to pass over opposition in silence endangered the democratic order in Haiti and the Government was therefore called upon to make a firm commitment to ratify the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). The Worker members also shared the deep concern of the Committee of Experts at the reporting failures of the Government, which needed to ensure compliance with its constitutional obligations. It was also to be regretted that, due to the delay in the designation of the Haitian delegation, the titular Haitian Workers' delegate had not been able to take part in the examination of the case. That amounted to negligence by the Government with respect to its obligations towards the ILO and a complaint had been lodged with the Credentials Committee. The Worker members condemned the threats and pressure to which trade unionists were subjected in Haiti. The Government needed to take every measure to ensure an environment that was conducive to the free expression of trade union views and the safety of all trade union activists so that they could exercise their activities in full freedom and without fear of reprisals so that the democratic order in Haiti could be safeguarded. The Worker members regretted that the Employer members had encouraged the Government to denounce ratified working-time Conventions and had challenged the relevance of the international labour standards on working time. The examination of an individual case by the Committee could not be used to assess the pertinence of the standards under examination and must be confined to assessing their correct application in the law and practice of the country concerned. The Worker members recalled the conclusions of the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Working-Time Arrangements, held in October 2011, which clearly indicated that the ILO's current standards on working time remained relevant and should be promoted in order to facilitate decent work.

The Employer member of Malawi, speaking on behalf of the Employer member of Haiti in her absence, noted that, while the provisions of the new Act on working time were not as precise as the repealed provisions of the Labour Code, enterprises were obliged to respect the provisions of Conventions Nos 1, 14, 30 and 106 ratified by Haiti since those provisions were legally binding and took precedence over domestic laws by virtue of article 276-2 of the Haitian Constitution. Moreover, the application decree of the Act on working time having not yet been published, the articles of the Labour Code still applied in Haiti. The speaker considered that Conventions Nos 1 and 30 on hours of work did not fully reflect the modern realities of working time. The low rates of ratification of these two Conventions were due to the increased need for flexibility in today's work environment. Countries reverted more frequently to collective or individual labour agreements to address their specific needs on working time. The speaker indicated that, while awaiting the promulgation of the new Labour Code, the Employers in Haiti were determined to continue to engage in tripartite dialogue with a view to adopting the operational framework necessary to ensure conformity with the international instruments ratified by Haiti. He seized the opportunity to thank the ILO for the continuous technical support provided to Haiti and for its role as facilitator in the tripartite dialogue conducted to resume the work on the reform of the Labour Code.

The Worker member of Haiti said that the current situation in the world of work in Haiti was a matter of great concern. Referring in particular to domestic work and the informal economy, he denounced the existence of unfair working conditions in relation to working time, the right to annual leave and prior notice in the event of dismissal. With regard to the situation of security officers and workers in subcontracting enterprises in the textile sector, he deplored the absence of fixed working hours and the refusal of employers to pay overtime, with the complicity of the Government. He drew the Committee's attention to the blatant violation of Conventions Nos 1, 14, 30 and 106 on working hours, as well as Convention No. 81. The labour inspectorate in Haiti lacked resources and capacity. Although the ILO had contributed to building the capacity of a group of inspectors, they were often prevented from acting in a neutral manner and were subject to significant pressures. The new Act, adopted at the initiative of the employers, demonstrated the Government's disregard for its ILO commitments. It allowed employers to force men and women workers to work overtime, which resulted in cases of serious abuse, such as the exertion of psychological pressure and the emergence of forced labour. The Government had decided unilaterally to amend the Labour Code by repealing certain provisions, even though it had requested and obtained ILO technical assistance in the context of the overall reform of the Code, and the finalization of the reform had been identified as a priority in terms of the results to be achieved under the Decent Work Country Programme. The Haitian trade unions called for the resumption of the process of reforming the Labour Code, which must respect the spirit and terms of Conventions Nos 1, 14, 30 and 106 with regard to working time. He hoped that the commitments made in the recent agreement signed under the auspices of the ILO would be respected, and requested the ILO to ensure the close and strict follow-up of the application by Haiti of the ratified Conventions on working time.

The Government member of Bulgaria speaking on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States, as well as Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Montenegro, Serbia, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Norway, noted the timeliness of the discussion of this case following the debate on the General Survey on working time instruments. Working hours and rest periods were central to the employment relationship and had important consequences for both workers and employers. Haiti was the largest recipient of bilateral EU development assistance in Latin America and the Caribbean. The speaker recalled the commitment made by Haiti under the Cotonou Agreement (the framework for cooperation with the EU) to respect democracy, the rule of law and human rights principles. She noted with great concern that the new Act repealed most of the provisions of the Labour Code giving effect to the ratified Conventions on working time and that it did not give effect to important matters covered by these Conventions, including on central issues such as the maximum number of working hours per day and the principle of weekly rest. She also expressed concern over the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP) regarding non-observance in practice of the provisions of the Labour Code respecting hours of work and weekly rest as well as the absence of resources of the labour inspection services to take effective action to combat violations. The Government was urged to complete the reform of the Labour Code in consultation with the social partners and to ensure that it was in full conformity with ILO Conventions. The Government was also requested to ensure in practice that workers benefit from the protection afforded by Conventions on working time and to take the necessary measures to carry out labour inspections to make this protection effective. The Government was strongly encouraged to continue to avail itself of ILO technical assistance and to comply with its reporting obligations. The EU and its Member States would continue to support Haiti in its efforts to comply with ILO Conventions.

An observer representing the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) drew attention to the Decent Work Country Programme, signed by the Haitian Government, employers, workers and the ILO in 2015, the first intended outcome of which was to resume the process of revising the Labour Code, which should have been completed by 31 July 2015. Instead, the Act organizing and regulating work over a 24-hour period divided into three segments of eight hours had been adopted in August 2017. The Act violated the fundamental principles of work and jeopardized the conformity of domestic legislation with international standards on the subject. The strict regulation of working time guaranteed a decent life and a good work–life balance, protected health, prevented forced labour and ensured remuneration that was in keeping with the effort made. The adoption of the new Act on working time therefore represented a major backward step and disregarded the work undertaken within the framework of the ILO and the commitments made in terms of social dialogue and tripartism. The Act was having a serious impact, particularly on the most vulnerable workers. The negotiation of working time on an individual and non-collective basis opened the door, in practice, to the strengthening of the unlimited power of employers, greater employer pressure to increase working time and penalties for workers who did not agree to submit to the needs of enterprises. The situation was a matter of even more concern as the labour inspectorate was not functional, lacked capacity and resources, and was sometimes corrupt. Furthermore, the Act removed the requirement for the consultation of trade unions on issues relating to possible exemptions from working-time rules. The Act also violated the principle of weekly rest and drastically reduced wage levels. He regretted the complacent attitude of the Government, which had decided to team up with the employers in violating international Conventions, and called on the Government to respect the fundamental rights of workers, and particularly to resume the process of reforming the Labour Code, in accordance with the agreements concluded.

The Worker member of the Dominican Republic drew attention to the fact that industrial relations in Haiti were not in compliance with important ILO Conventions. When a country had high levels of unemployment and poverty, job creation tended to be prioritized over decent work. However, decent work was a means of overcoming poverty. When workers in the maquila sector or export processing zones called for genuine labour reform, such as the reform that was currently blocked in Haiti, many believed that they were deterring foreign investment. However, any investment based on the poverty of workers did not make sense and should be rejected. He called on the Government to respect the Conventions and proceed with the labour reforms, without submitting to the rules respecting labour conditions imposed by enterprises, which were in breach of ILO Conventions.

The Worker member of Italy recalled that, after obtaining ILO technical assistance for the reform of the Labour Code, Haiti had concluded its Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) 2015–20, within the framework of tripartite negotiations under the auspices of the ILO. Although the DWCP envisaged that the reform of the Labour Code would be completed by July 2015, the Government had preferred to adopt an Act establishing a 24-hour working day divided into three eight-hour segments. The Act repealed several sections of the Labour Code, strengthened the power of employers and did not regulate overtime. The Act, which was in breach of all the ILO Conventions on working time, removed the requirement to consult representative trade unions when making decisions on working time and abandoned the principle of weekly rest. Furthermore, the loss of the 50 per cent pay supplement for night work and, in general, the increase in working time had resulted in dramatic reductions in wages, plunging workers and their families into even greater poverty. Although, in the context of ILO technical assistance, the labour inspection services had received technical training and capacity building, the inefficiencies of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour and the lack of resources had rendered the labour inspectorate powerless in relation to employers. She denounced the failures of the Government in relation to fundamental labour rights and its disregard for its obligations under ILO Conventions. She called on the Government to resume the process of reforming the Labour Code, in full compliance with the principles of tripartism.

An observer representing IndustriALL Global Union stated that for workers in the Haitian garment industry, ILO standards on working hours and the 48-hour working week were unfortunately meaningless concepts. They were working long hours in order to survive on starvation wages. When overtime was paid, it was almost always below the legal rate. The failure of the Government to uphold international standards and national laws was giving factories and their multinational customers free reign to steal wages and the lives from some of the world's poorest workers. The introduction of the new Act on working time, which repealed existing standards on overtime, weekly rest, Sunday pay and night time rates, only made matters worse. In May of 2017, the workers of 22 garment factories went on strike to demand higher wages. Dozens of union leaders and members had yet to be reinstated, and were even blacklisted, in spite of very clear recommendations following an investigation by the ILO's Better Work Programme. Finally, the speaker stated that without better wages and respect for workers and union rights, the ILO Conventions on hours of work would remain on the wish list and there would be no lasting social peace in Haiti's garment industry.

The Worker member of Uruguay considered that addressing the case of the compliance by Haiti with the working-time Conventions from a technical point of view and asking Haitian workers to adapt to new working hours was to deny the existence of a humanitarian tragedy. He believed that the solution to the problems lay in social dialogue. He indicated that it was necessary to help Haiti to resume social dialogue with the objective of achieving decent work. He called for the case to be addressed from that perspective.

The Government representative noted the constructive spirit in which the remarks and recommendations had been made during the discussion. He reiterated the Government's determination to respect its international commitments and to pursue tripartite dialogue. As the decree to implement the new Act had not yet been published, an agreed solution was still possible. The agreement signed between the social partners in March 2018 was an ideal framework for continuing discussions. He requested ILO technical assistance to support that process.

The Worker members welcomed the Government's determination to take action to bring its legislation on working time into line with international Conventions and expressed the hope that this determination would lead to concrete action in practice. Working-time issues were fundamental. The following action could usefully be taken by the Government to bring its law and practice into conformity with the international Conventions on working time. Firstly, guaranteeing consultation with all representative social partners for any revision of the regulation of working time with a view to bringing it into conformity with Conventions Nos 1, 14, 30 and 106. Following the agreement reached in March 2018 with the social partners with a view to resuming social dialogue, consultation with all the social partners could usefully be undertaken within the framework of the comprehensive reform of the Labour Code that had been interrupted. That would allow the Government to fulfil its commitment made in the Decent Work Country Programme 2015–20 to complete the global reform. The Worker members called on the Government to resume that process in close collaboration with the ILO. The Government should work in conjunction with the social partners on several issues. Accordingly, and without exceptions in the legislation, it was necessary to apply and enforce the principle of an eight-hour working day and to declare illegal the exceptions applied in practice. Furthermore, a limitative list of cases in which overtime was justified should be reintroduced, along with limits on overtime. The disappearance from the Labour Code of any explicit mention of the principle of the minimum period of weekly rest of at least 24 consecutive hours, which should wherever possible be on Sunday and granted simultaneously to all workers in the same establishment, constituted a failure to comply with the obligations set out in the Convention. That principle should therefore be reintroduced into the Labour Code. The Government must provide, in law and practice, for consultation with the social partners on any proposed reform of those issues. The possibility for individual negotiations between a worker and an employer on exceptions to the maximum working day should be removed from the legislation. Individual bargaining on such important matters as working time was extremely sensitive in view of the fundamentally asymmetric nature of the contract of employment, with the employer having authority over the worker. Inspection services were essential to ensure that working-time legislation was respected in practice. The inspection services should therefore be provided with sufficient staff and material and financial resources. Adequate training for inspectors on working time and international standards was also essential. The Government should respect and ensure respect for the independence of the inspection services. Particular attention should also be given to regulating working time in the informal economy and export processing zones, where a large majority of Haitians worked, by ensuring that inspection services were competent to enforce the legislation in such zones. The case showed that the absence of a report from a Government did not mean that it could escape the ILO supervisory bodies. The Worker members called on the Government to submit its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligations. The violence and intimidations reported against trade union activists were unacceptable. The Worker members urged the Government to bring an end to any acts of intimidation towards trade union representatives in Haiti, carry out thorough investigations and impose effective and dissuasive penalties on those responsible. It was important for trade union activists to be able to carry out their activities freely and without fear of reprisal. In order to implement all those recommendations, the Government was strongly urged to request technical assistance from the Office. In response to the comment that the low number of ratifications of the Conventions under consideration could be due to the fact that they lacked flexibility, the Worker members emphasized that it was more indicative of the need for a large-scale ratification campaign for those Conventions, which had been adopted on a tripartite basis, to make member States aware of the principles that they contained and the flexibility of the instruments.

The Employer members stated that it was clear that Haiti was not immune to the realities of a changing world of work, which required more modern, flexible and responsive regulating measures. They wished to make clear that, far from encouraging the Government not to comply with ratified Conventions, Haiti needed to comply with all international obligations voluntarily assumed. They pointed out that the only way for a Government to escape compliance with a ratified Convention was to denounce the Convention when the window for denunciation opened. They urged the Government to continue with the reform process, in collaboration with social partners and under the guidance of the ILO, in order to comply with its obligations under ratified Conventions. Finally, they urged the Government to seek technical assistance from the ILO to rectify the situation of serious failure to comply with its reporting obligations.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that followed. The Committee expressed concern over a number of legislative provisions stipulated in the 2017 Act on working time, which are not in conformity with the ratified Conventions on working time. The Committee noted that the application decree of the new law has not been published and that the Labour Code continues to apply. The Committee noted with regret that the comprehensive reform of the Labour Code has not been finalized.

Taking into account the Government's submissions and the discussion of the case that followed, the Committee urged the Government to:

- review in consultation with the most representative employers and workers organizations the conformity of the Labour Code and the Act on working time, with respect to the ratified ILO Conventions on working time;
- strengthen the labour inspectorate and other relevant enforcement mechanisms to ensure that workers benefit from the protection afforded by the Conventions; and
- report to the Committee of Experts on these measures.

The Committee calls on the Government to avail itself of technical assistance to address these matters. The Committee calls on the Government to submit without delay all the reports due to the Committee of Experts and include a detailed report on the measures taken to implement these conclusions to the next meeting of the Committee of Experts in November 2018.

The Government representative said that the Haitian delegation had taken due note of the discussions and conclusions adopted by the Conference Committee and shared the view of the Committee of Experts in its report that working hours and the organization of work can have a profound influence, not only on the quality of work, but also on the private life of workers, their "physical and mental health and well-being ... their safety at work and during the transit to and from their homes, and their earnings". The Conventions that Haiti had ratified were part of its body of domestic law under article 276-2 of the Constitution, and took precedence over national laws in the hierarchy of standards and could be invoked without reserve before the courts. Taking note of the observations of the Committee of Experts concerning the application of the Act of 7 August 2017 on working time, the Government was planning to hold tripartite consultations to identify and overcome the main difficulties encountered in the application of the Act, and to issue orders or regulations to specify its scope. The Government was also aware of the delay in finalizing the process of reforming the Labour Code. Discussions had begun at the level of the Prime Minister's Office and would be continued within a tripartite framework, in the spirit of the San José Agreement of 21 March 2018, taking into account the Office's recommendations.

Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention, 1925 (No. 19)

SARAWAK (ratification: 1964)

A Government representative indicated that the Government had noted the concerns raised by the Committee in 2017 as well as its conclusions calling for the re-establishment of equality of treatment through the extension of the coverage of the Employees' Social Security Scheme (ESS) to foreign workers. The Government had in fact agreed to extend the protection of the ESS, which would come under the Social Security Organization (SOCSO), to foreign workers and had taken serious measures over the past year to that effect. However, that process needed to be done in a just and fair manner and at a pace that was comfortable to both employers and workers, as well as the insurance panels, the system provider and the SOCSO. A period to ensure the smooth transition of foreign workers to the ESS was needed to allow for the establishment of implementation mechanisms, databases and roadmaps, and the organization of engagement sessions with stakeholders and the social partners to accommodate the change. Over the past year, the Government had taken several steps to strengthen and enhance the existing Workmen's Compensation Scheme (WCS) with the objective of phasing it out during a transition period of a maximum of three years. This transition period was needed in view of three main factors. First, the SOCSO had only recently been made responsible for the implementation of the Employment Insurance System and needed a certain time for the funds to be sustainable and the administrative matters related to the Employment Insurance System to operate smoothly. In addition, the existing Social Security Act would need to be amended. Secondly, there existed contractual obligations with the insurance panels and the system provider of the e-compensation scheme. Lastly, employers needed to be provided with ample time to adjust to the changes that would occur when the WCS shifted to the ESS. In light of the recent changes that had occurred in the Government, the transition plan would be submitted to the new administration for consideration and approval. The Government was ready to take immediate action, which included further deliberations and engagement with the social partners. No foreign worker should be left without coverage for both employment and non-employment injuries. It was the responsibility of states to protect the rights of foreign workers and prevent all forms of discrimination. But it should be noted that access to medical care had always been made available to all workers, regardless of their status. The Government fully supported the principles of equality of treatment and was committed to complying with the request of the Committee to ensure that foreign workers had access to accident compensation. The Government had already sought ILO technical expertise and was ready to forge closer collaboration with the guidance and approval of the new administration. Discussions would be held and technical assistance be sought from the Office on the matter under discussion with a view to developing appropriate mechanisms to overcome any issues that might arise.

The Worker members stated that, for over two decades, the ILO supervisory mechanisms had been addressing the persistent issue of equal treatment of migrant workers, in particular with respect to employment injury. Since 1993, the Committee of Experts had addressed the transfer of foreign workers, employed in Malaysia for up to five years from the ESS, which provided for periodical payments to victims of industrial accidents, to the WCS, which guaranteed only a lump sum payment of a significantly lower amount. Lowering the protection afforded to migrant workers was a clear breach of Article 1 of the Convention, which required ratifying States to grant to migrant workers who suffered injury due to industrial accidents which occurred in its territory, or to their dependents, the same treatment in respect of workmen's compensation as it granted to its own nationals. The Committee had discussed the case on multiple occasions, requesting the extension of the coverage of the ESS to migrant workers and the development, in consultation with the social partners, of laws and regulations that would ensure the removal of discriminatory practices between migrant and national workers. It had also noted with deep regret that the Government had taken no measures to implement the conclusions of the Committee, nor had it responded to the Committee of Expert's express request to provide a detailed report on the application of the Convention. For many years, millions of migrant workers had been affected by this discriminatory treatment, despite filling substantial shortages in the supply of low-skilled labour for key economic sectors. It was estimated that around 20–30 per cent of the country's workforce was constituted of migrant workers coming from a number of different countries, such as Cambodia, Indonesia, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Myanmar, Philippines, Thailand and Viet Nam. In addition to the 2 million legally registered migrant workers, there were also several million undocumented migrant workers. It was estimated that between 1 and 4 million undocumented migrant workers who were engaged in the most hazardous jobs were not eligible for any compensation. Approximately one third of the workers in the agricultural, manufacturing and construction sectors were migrant workers, with migrant workers making up to 70 per cent of workers in the agricultural sector. Although those industries had contributed 297 billion ringgits (€63 billion) or 35.7 per cent of Malaysia's gross domestic product in 2014, the rate of occupational accidents was extremely high. According to official data, between January and October 2017, the Department of Occupational Safety and Health had recorded 1,645 workplace accidents causing permanent or temporary disability and 46 fatal accidents in the manufacturing sector alone. In the same period, the construction industry and the agricultural sector had claimed the lives of 63 and 18 workers, respectively. Given that official statistics only took into account investigated accidents, it was estimated that the real number of workplace accidents was even higher. Despite those appalling numbers and the enormous contribution of migrant labour to the economic growth and development of Malaysia over the years, the Government continued to deny equal and fair treatment to migrant workers. While under the ESS, a permanently injured worker was entitled to a periodical cash benefit of 90 per cent of his/her "assumed average daily wage" (section 22b and the fourth Schedule of the Social Security Act), permanently injured migrant workers in the same situation would only be entitled to a lump sum payment of 62 months' salary or 23,000 ringgits (around €4,900) under section 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (WCA). The payment of a lump sum instead of periodic payments in itself amounted to a differentiation in the quality of the protection provided, as existing global evidence demonstrated. Furthermore, the level of the lump sum payment provided to migrant workers was a mere fraction of the amount to which Malaysian workers were entitled in the exact same situation. An actuarial simulation undertaken by the ILO, estimated that a national worker was entitled to a total of 425,000 ringgits, with periodic payments calculated as a lump sum. According to that simulation, migrant workers were entitled to about 23,000 ringgits which meant that they were only entitled to 5.4 per cent of the benefits received by Malaysian workers. Such a level of discrimination between workers in the twenty-first century was shocking and appalling to say the very least.

With regard to medical care, Malaysian workers were entitled to the free treatment of injuries at any public hospital or clinic, with the medical bill being settled by the ESS fund. Under the WCS, medical expenses for work injuries were borne by the employer, which exposed migrant workers to possible abuses, as employers might refuse to pay for the necessary treatment. In addition, migrant workers could only claim refunds for medical costs after they had fully recovered, and even then it usually took several months for them to be refunded, leaving them with no means of survival in the meantime. Undocumented migrant workers ran the risk of being arrested while attempting to access medical treatment. Furthermore, a national worker who sustained a workplace injury causing a temporary inability to work for at least four days was entitled to temporary disability benefits equivalent to 80 per cent of his or her wage. Migrant workers temporarily incapacitated due to workplace injury were only entitled to half-monthly payments equivalent to one third of their monthly wage. It should be noted that migrant workers were subject to other forms of unequal treatment. As the Committee had noted in its 2016 examination of the application in the country of the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), migrant workers still faced a number of practical obstacles to collective bargaining, in particular due to insecure employment contracts and vulnerability due to anti-union discrimination. In addition, the estimated 300,000 to 400,000 migrant domestic workers employed in Malaysia were still denied basic labour protection under national laws, and suffered from abusive working conditions, including cases of forced labour. The Government had taken severe measures with regard to undocumented migrant workers. In July 2017, the Malaysian authorities had arrested over 3,300 undocumented migrant workers who had failed to register for an E-card. Due to their fear of detention and deportation, many migrant workers had gone into hiding, which severely limited their access to social protection. The Worker members expressed their deep concern at the situation of migrant workers, who constituted a significant part of the working population of the country. Despite numerous discussions in the Committee, the technical advice provided by the ILO and the Government's statements that it would take the measures, they had not materialized so far. They urged the Government, with the greatest insistence, to bring its legislation and social security institutions into conformity with the Convention and to ensure equal treatment between migrant and national workers with respect to occupational injuries in an effective and expeditious manner. As a party to the Comprehensive and Progressive Agreement for Trans-Pacific Partnership (CPTPP), Malaysia was required to undertake legislative reforms to eliminate all discriminatory provisions. The new Government had renewed Malaysia's commitment to undertaking such necessary reforms. They expected that the Government would fully honour its commitments by taking swift and concrete action to eliminate all forms of discrimination against migrant workers.

The Employer members recalled the numerous observations that had been made by the Committee of Experts over a number of years. In addition to the technical issues raised by the Worker members, it was important to consider the context of the situation. The examination of the case concerned Malaysia and Malaysia – Peninsular, that is, Peninsular Malaysia and East Malaysia. Malaysia was a federal state. It was made up of 13 federal states and three federal territories, divided between two regions. Governance of the state was divided between the federal and state governments, while the federal government exercised direct administration over the federal territories. Of particular note was the fact that the states of East Malaysia (Sabah and Sarawak) had separate immigration policies and controls, and a unique residency status. Visas were required for travel between those two states or between either state and Peninsular Malaysia, which created a number of issues, including in terms of the administration of the schemes at the national level. The situation giving rise to the discussion of the case had begun in 1993, when foreign workers had been transferred from the ESS, which provided for periodical payments to victims of industrial accidents, to the WSC, which guaranteed only a lump sum payment of compensation for industrial accidents. Over the years, the supervisory bodies had expressed concern at the differences in those schemes, indicated by the Worker members. The Government's intention to carry out reforms and to align or realign the provisions applicable to foreign workers with the scheme for national workers should be welcomed. However, they also noted that as far back as 2011, the Government had indicated that a technical committee the Ministry of Human Resources, including all stakeholders, had considered the three following options: (1) the extension of the ESS to cover foreign workers; (2) the creation of a special scheme for foreign workers under the ESS; and (3) raising the level of benefits provided by the WSC to an equivalent level to those provided by the ESS. That was not the first time that the Government had provided similar information, and concrete action was not expected. It should be noted that the Government had expressed its willingness and commitment to address the situation before the present Committee.

They were aware that making those changes was easier said than done, considering a number of existing challenges. Under the ESS, workers were required to contribute for a minimum of 24 months before they or their family could receive any benefits, in the event of industrial accidents or occupational diseases. Foreign workers had often not been in the country long enough to have access to those benefits, while under the WSC, they were covered immediately in case of injury. While there were differences in the monetary compensation, as indicated by the Worker members, other elements also needed to be taken into account. Since foreign workers were generally contracted for fewer than 24 months, it had become evident that the ESS scheme was not suitable for them, at least not in its current form. Taking into account the large number of migrant workers concerned and their statistically high accident rate, achieving the objective of equity required the reconciliation of three main factors: first, the administrative and practical difficulties that impeded equal treatment of migrant workers, including that migrant workers were typically in Malaysia for project-type work, usually fewer than 24 months. Also, if they were incapacitated in industrial accidents, they were often repatriated making compensation an administrative challenge. Second, there was the question of whether or not the Convention required absolute equality of treatment. The actual requirement of the

Sarawak (ratification: 1964)

Convention was that workers had to receive the same treatment, which was often not possible for practical reasons. That raised the question of a broader interpretation, for example whether treatment of equal value was as acceptable as exactly the same treatment. Third, irrespective of the interpretation chosen, and given that the ESS scheme was difficult to apply to workers who were not in the country for the minimum qualifying period, it was essential to determine the actuarial equivalence of the lump sum paid under the WCS to migrant workers to the value of the periodic payments. The comparison between the value of the periodical benefits and that of a lump sum benefit was a particularly delicate and technical question. Depending on the answer, it was possible for the WCS to be viewed as a valid way of managing employment injury and invalidity benefits for foreign workers in Malaysia. This could require the adjustment of the payment. But the quantum of compensation was not the only consideration as coverage was also important. The ESS scheme applied only to workplace accidents (including commuting) that resulted in at least four days of sick leave, whereas no such restrictions applied to the WCS. With respect to coverage, the WCS was arguably more favourable to foreign workers than the ESS was to nationals. A number of other member States with federal or state jurisdictions faced similar challenges. That was the reason why a number of such States did not ratify Conventions unless their federal laws required compliance by States. However, since it was arguably outside the mandate of the Committee to request that member States to change their constitutions, it should be recognized that a solution to the issue was unlikely to involve the application of the domestic scheme directly to migrant workers. Instead, a hybrid solution should be sought to achieve a sustainable outcome, taking into account the practical challenges. In conclusion, the Committee should acknowledge the Government's commitment to making progress on the issue, as well as its commitment to the value of equivalence. The Government should, as soon as possible, provide plans and processes on how it intended to achieve progress.

The Worker member of Malaysia said that Malaysia was a major destination country for migrant workers in Asia. There were about 2 million migrant workers with regular immigration status, while it was estimated that there were about 4 million migrant workers in an irregular situation, with an accurate number for the latter still being unavailable. The Committee had examined the case for the first time in 1996 after the downgrading of migrant workers from the ESS to the WCS in 1993. The compensation for workplace accidents involving migrant workers had continued to remain blatantly unequal. For example, national workers under the ESS were entitled to two forms of payment: temporary disablement and invalidity payment. They were also entitled to other additional benefits such as medical benefits, constant attendance allowance, vocational rehabilitation, dependants' funeral and education benefits. On the other hand, migrant workers were entitled to a one-off payment under an insurance scheme that had to be purchased by employers, on the condition that the employers had purchased it. The insurance benefit entitlements provided constituted about US$2,500 to $6,281 for accidental death or permanent disability sustained during working hours. Migrant workers could also claim meagre sums for medical treatment and approximately US$1,206 could be claimed for repatriation and funeral expenses. If migrant workers were injured outside working hours, they had to sustain a permanent disability to benefit from an insurance which was supposed to cover loss of pay, compensation, treatment costs and reparation. Migrant workers in Malaysia were largely employed in dangerous jobs without sufficient protective equipment or training, and they also lived in very poor conditions. A high incidence of workplace accidents and commuting accidents had been documented, with the largest number of occupational injuries and deaths occurring in the manufacturing, construction and agricultural sectors, all of which were major sectors of employment for migrant workers. In 2018, the death of three migrant workers had caught the attention of the media. The 28-year-old Adelina had died in February 2018 at Taman Kota Permai Bukit Mertajam as a result of abuse. A post-mortem report found that she had died of organ failures, and the police had not ruled out the possibility that, in addition to being beaten and slapped, the maid's health had also been neglected, including by not giving her proper food and shelter for several months. The family had been paid an amount equivalent to three years' wages that had not been paid and compensation for the family, which had included the costs of repatriation and the funeral. In another case, an Indian migrant worker, Mr Lathif, a 22-year-old documented worker in Malaysia since January 2018, had been pinned under an overturned tractor while working in an oil palm plantation. He had died in May 2018 as a result of his serious injuries. The meagre compensation sum had yet to be paid to the family. Moreover, Haironnissa, an Indonesian migrant worker, had died of a high fever while in service. The panel clinic doctor had refused to refer her to hospital for further treatment. Her supervisor and production officer had failed to assist her, and she had died after her parents had taken her back to Indonesia. Action was still pending to investigate the company. Since January 2018, the Malaysian Trades Union Congress (MTUC) had been informed of 42 cases concerning occupational accidents of migrant workers. A total of 60 per cent of those workers had suffered salary deductions, inadequate access to medical treatment and were unable to work. No steps had been taken to implement the objectives of the Eleventh Malaysia Plan (2016–20), namely: (1) developing and implementing a comprehensive immigration and employment policy for migrant workers; (2) engaging with the tripartite constituents; and (3) providing the Committee with the detailed reports requested in 2011 and 2017. This was the fifth time since 1996 that the Committee had examined the Government's failure to comply with the Convention. While the issue remained unresolved, the life, safety and security of migrant workers continued to be at stake. After 60 years, the Government had been replaced. The new Government should undo the wrong that had been done and reinstate equality of treatment of migrant workers in conformity with the Convention in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee of Experts without any further delay.

The Employer member of Malaysia noted that foreign workers in Malaysia were currently insured under the WCS, established by the WCA. The scheme had been working well, as foreign workers were provided many benefits, including: a lump sum payment for injuries or death; payments for injuries sustained during work; and payment for repatriating the deceased body to the country of origin in the event of death. The Labour Department was empowered to assess speedily claims for workmen's compensation, receive payments from the respective insurance company and disburse workmen's compensations to the dependants of deceased workers. Finally, the insurance premium under the WCS, ranging from 68 to 72 ringgits per employee per year, was fully paid by employers. More concretely, the types of benefits and compensation under the WCS were the following: (1) in the case of temporary disablement: half-monthly payments of up to 165 ringgits for up to five years; (2) in the event of permanent total disablement: payments in the amount of wages for 60 months or 23,000 ringgits (whichever amount was inferior); if in need of constant personal assistance, an additional 25 per cent would be added to the compensation; (3) in the event of permanent partial disablement: a percentage of 23,000 ringgits depending on the degree of physical impairment or loss of earning capacity; (4) in the case of death during work or commuting: payments of the amount of wages for 60 months or 18,000 ringgits (whichever was inferior); (5) in the case of death or permanent total disablement: 23,000 ringgits; and (6) repatriation expenses for death or permanent total disablement: 4,800 ringgits. Taking into account those benefits and the accident coverage, it was ironic that the Committee had insisted on multiple occasions that foreign workers should be placed under SOCSO coverage, without examining whether that was really beneficial for foreign workers. For example, under the Employment Injury Scheme, coverage was limited to workplace employment injury, which included commuting injury, which had to fulfill the criteria that the sick leave arising out of employment injury was at least four days of unavailability for work, as compared to the WCS which provided for 24-hour coverage. In view of the above, while the examination by the Committee was based on the technical issues of equality of treatment, there was no realization that placing foreign workers under the SOCSO would be to their detriment. The insistence of the Committee to examine the present case would eventually result in foreign workers being covered by the Employment Injury Scheme which was only applicable for workplace employment injury, instead of the WCS, which provided 24-hour coverage with a list of benefits as indicated above which were superior and more beneficial than the benefits under the SOCSO Employment Injury Scheme.

The Government member of Bulgaria, speaking on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States as well as Montenegro, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and the European Free Trade Association (EFTA) countries, Norway and the Member of the European Economic Area) said that the EU–Malaysia Partnership and Cooperation Agreement concluded two years ago had further strengthened its bilateral cooperation with the EU and had encompassed a wide range of areas, including human rights and sectoral cooperation on labour and employment. Nevertheless, it was deeply regrettable that the case had already been discussed the previous year by the Committee and that the discriminatory treatment of foreign workers was a long-standing issue that had persisted since 1993, despite recurrent calls by the Committee to putting an end to the practice. Since the detailed report, as requested by the Committee, had not been provided by the Government, she was bound to reiterate the same comments as the previous year. Migrant workers provided much needed skills and made an invaluable contribution to the social and economic development of Malaysia and often filled jobs that were considered undesirable by nationals. Yet their contribution was often not fully recognized, and they remained vulnerable to precarious conditions, abusive practices and unequal treatment, which contributed, among other issues, to an increased risk of accidents and health problems. She therefore urged the Government to take prompt measures to extend the social security scheme for national workers to foreign workers in order to bring an end to that discriminatory practice and ensure equal treatment of foreign workers, particularly with regard to accident compensation. In conclusion, she reiterated the commitment of the EU to a constructive engagement and partnership with Malaysia.

The Government member of Thailand, speaking on behalf of the member States of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), welcomed the progress made by the Government and its willingness to extend the social security scheme to foreign workers, as well as the measures adopted. The Government should be encouraged to continue its efforts to realize its commitment with respect to the Convention, in particular to ensure equal treatment of foreign workers with regard to accident compensation. The Committee should consider the efforts made by the Government.

The Worker member of the United States recalled that there were two distinct workers' compensation systems in Malaysia: one for Malaysians, the other for registered migrant workers. Unregistered migrant workers were not covered by any kind of accident compensation, even though they outnumbered registered migrant workers by an estimated two to one. To be cynical, there were actually three schemes in Malaysia: the ESS, WCS and nothing at all. There was no accountability for employers in relation to purchasing the workers' compensation insurance. If an employer purchased no insurance, inadequate insurance or insurance with exclusions (for example, for injuries that occurred without the proper safety equipment), it was only the injured worker that suffered. Moreover, the registration of migrant workers was tied to specific employers. If a worker was injured performing work for another employer, not only was the worker no longer covered by the WCS, but he faced the risk of being arrested when seeking medical attention and of being deported. The WCS set a maximum limit for lump sum payments, which were abused by employers. For example, a Nepali construction worker had a workplace accident that had resulted in the loss of four fingers. The medical costs had been more than the 25,000 ringgits provided by the insurance policy. His employer had not only used the entire lump sum payment to pay for the medical expenses but was now charging the worker for the expenses, in excess of the policy. The worker was, in fact, paying for the injury, rather than being compensated for it. Sadly, under the WCS, that was a "best case" scenario, as that worker's employer had purchased an insurance policy for the maximum amount. In the absence of labour inspections, there was no way of holding employers accountable for compliance with the minimum guarantees under the WCA, which was already in violation of the Convention, and did not cover two-thirds of the migrant workforce in the country. There was also no way for workers to lodge complaints for inadequate insurance, and particularly no way for them to do so without fear of retaliation. Not only was the existence of two accident compensation schemes for national and migrant workers plainly discriminatory and in violation of the Convention, but it was also exploitative of migrant workers. The WCA was a legal means of refusing to take care of workers injured at work, and offered a convenient means of avoiding obligations once the lump sum was paid. It was that kind of exploitation that the Convention sought to eliminate.

The Worker member of Singapore noted that, although the laws did not explicitly discriminate against migrant workers, in practice the rights of migrant workers were not fully protected due to the inaction of the Government. There were several examples. First, according to the Employee Provident Fund Act, 1991 (Act No. 452), contributions to the Employee Provident Fund were mandatory, but were voluntary for migrant workers. Moreover, migrant workers could withdraw savings only in the event of death, mental or physical incapacitation, or their return to their country of origin. Secondly, pursuant to the Trade Union Act, 1959 (No. 262), Malaysian workers could organize and form trade unions, while migrant workers only had this right if their employers had no objection. However, the Ministry of Home Affairs had set an absolute prohibition on migrant workers from joining any sort of association. Thirdly, under the Employment Act, 1955, every worker had to have a contract of employment clearly naming the employer. However, migrant workers were faced with the absence of employment contracts or contracts with less favourable conditions than those agreed before departure from their country of origin. Some employers did not renew the permit of workers, resulting in migrants losing their legal status. Migrant workers were also faced with issues regarding the right to collective bargaining, the non-payment of wages, unfair dismissal and the lack of protective workplace equipment. He referred to a pending complaint to a regional Labour Department concerning a Nepali worker who had been injured, who had not received any wages during his period of medical leave, and who had had to pay his medical expenses. Without paying 3,000 ringgits to the placement agency, he would not be able to return to his country of origin. As a result of an investigation by the Regional Labour Department, various labour law violations had been determined. Discriminatory practices such as those described above were occurring to migrant workers on a daily basis. Considering that the issue relating to the Convention had persisted for over 20 years, he called on the Government to restore migrant workers under the SOCSO and to ensure equal treatment and protection of migrant workers.

The Worker member of Australia said that the significantly inferior compensation rights of migrant workers were a direct breach of the Convention and remained of serious concern. According to estimates, between 4 and 6 million migrant workers were working in Malaysia. A large percentage of them were engaged by outsourcing or recruitment agencies, with more than 2,000 agencies in Malaysia alone. Legislative changes had made migrant workers employees of those agencies rather than of the employers for whom they provided labour, with those agencies organizing the legal documents. Although illegal, many migrant workers faced debt bondage situations. The withholding of passports was common and human trafficking occurred on an increasing scale. An Amnesty International report in 2010 had found that migrant workers were highly dependent on the agents because, if they left or were dismissed by the agency their status changed to being illegal. Referring to the example of a Nepalese migrant worker employed by a recruitment agency, who did not know the name of his employer, which made it difficult to claim accident compensation, she emphasized that the current system meant that it was difficult to obtain a clear picture of the incidence of injury among migrant workers. Outsourcing also further limited the capacity of the labour inspectorate, which already made very few labour inspections. Despite past offers of ILO technical assistance, the breaches of the Convention had persisted.

The Worker member of Indonesia, speaking on behalf of the Indonesian Workers Welfare Union (IWWU), the Cambodian Labour Confederation (CLC), the Federation of Trade Unions of Myanmar (CTUM), the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU), the Korean Confederation of Trade Unions (KCTU), the Federation of Free Workers (FFW) and the Center of United and Progressive Workers (SENTRO) if the Philippines emphasized that, despite the vital role played by migrant workers in the development of the South-East Asian region, they were often subject to abuse. Malaysia had benefited greatly from the employment of migrant workers in several economically important sectors, such as manufacturing, construction and plantations. However, the situation regarding migrant workers, particularly with respect to employment injury compensation, was not in accordance with the Convention and it was necessary to take bold action. The high incidence of workplace accidents and deaths among foreign workers in Malaysia was of serious concern. At a current side event during the present session of the International Labour Conference, the interregional trade union organizations (Asia and the Pacific, Africa, America, Arab States, South-East Asia and South Asian) had signed a memorandum of understanding (MOU) to join and coordinate efforts with a view to better promoting the protection of migrant workers across the region. During the signing ceremony of that MOU, the Director-General had expressed ILO commitment to support the initiative. The Government should demonstrate a similar commitment to ensure that the issues of migrant workers were addressed effectively.

The Government representative said that all the comments made during the discussion would be taken seriously as they would help the Government to improve the situation in the country. Support was being sought from the Employer and Worker members of the country and particularly the latter, to act as a catalyst in realizing the transfer of the protection of foreign workers by the ESS. Managing the welfare of foreign workers had always been a priority for the Government, as set out in the Eleventh Malaysia Plan (2016–20). The Government was committed to this priority, despite the recent change of administration, and would ensure that the quality of protection for all workers in the country was in accordance with international labour standards, and particularly those Conventions that had been ratified by the country. The Government had agreed to expand the coverage of the ESS to foreign workers, which would be done in a progressive and cautious manner. He concluded by assuring the full and undivided commitment of the Government to make efforts to ensure that Malaysia abided by the principles of the Convention.

The Employer members said that the main issues raised in the discussion related to the different benefits to which foreign and national workers were entitled, and the practical challenges relating to the reintroduction of equal treatment for foreign and national workers. The discussion had shown the many instances and scenarios that could occur with regard to documented and undocumented foreign workers. The Government needed to address those challenges, in cooperation with the social partners. It also needed to give genuine consideration to how to deal with the individual situations of foreign workers who had been injured, who were in a desperate situation, and who were denied access to social security benefits. Such situations also occurred in many other countries, and not only Malaysia, but the individuals concerned needed consideration. The issues surrounding the case had been raised many times by the ILO supervisory bodies, and the Committee would have to be realistic in recognizing that changes would not be immediate. While the commitment of the Government had been heard before, the new Government had given a firm undertaking to achieve progress. Between the obligations out of the commitments under the CPTPP and the Convention, the only way for the Government was to go forward.

The Worker members emphasized that the Committee had abundantly discussed the long-standing and persistent issue at previous sessions, including last year, and had consistently urged the Government to bring its legislation into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. They welcomed the answers provided by the Government, which had been conveyed in a positive and constructive manner. However, despite benefiting from ILO technical assistance on the subject in 2016, the Government had taken no concrete steps to address the situation and ensure equal treatment for migrant workers and national workers with respect to workplace injury compensation. The required measures to remedy the situation were quite simple and involved the re-introduction of all migrant workers in the ESS, so as to guarantee equal treatment between migrant workers and national workers in relation to accident compensation. Their reintegration under the ESS would be in accordance with the principles of the Convention, and it had been recommended by the ILO technical team in 2016 as the most effective solution. Recalling that urgent action was required on the issue, they called on the Government to show its commitment to giving full effect to the Convention by taking immediate and effective measures to meet the requirement of the Convention for equal treatment of migrant workers and national workers with respect to workplace accident compensation. In view of the persistence of the situation, while welcoming the positive approach, the Worker members urged the Government to accept a direct contacts mission to assess progress before the next International Labour Conference. They thanked the Government for the response and hoped that the situation would evolve positively in the coming years.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral statements made by the Government representative and the discussion that followed.

The Committee welcomed the Government's stated commitment to ensuring the Convention's requirement for equal treatment of migrant workers and national workers.

Taking into account the Government's submissions, the discussion of the case that followed, and the 2017 conclusions of the Committee, the Committee urged the Government to:

- take steps to develop and communicate its policy for governing the recruitment and treatment of migrant workers;
- take immediate steps to conclude its work on the means for reinstating the equality of treatment of migrant workers, in particular by extending the coverage of the Employees' Social Security Scheme to migrant workers in a form that is effective;
- engage in genuine consultations with employers' and workers' organizations to develop laws and regulations that ensure the removal of discriminatory practices between migrant and national workers, in particular in relation to workplace injury;
- adopt special arrangements with other ratifying member States to overcome the administrative difficulties of monitoring the payment of compensation abroad; and
- take necessary legal and practical measures to ensure that migrant workers have access to medical care in the case of workplace injury.

The Committee called upon the Government to accept an ILO direct contacts mission with a view to implementing these recommendations and to develop mechanisms for overcoming the practical issues affecting the implementation of the domestic social security scheme to migrant workers.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29)

BELARUS (ratification: 1956)

The Government has provided the following written information.

Belarus has staunchly and consistently supported the prohibition and eradication of forced labour. The prohibition of the use of forced labour is enshrined in the country's most important legislative instruments. Article 41 of the Constitution prohibits forced labour, with the exception of work or services required under a court ruling or in accordance with the Law on Emergencies and Military Status. The prohibition of forced labour is also covered in article 13 of the Labour Code, which defines forced labour as work which a worker is required to perform subject to the threat of violence, which includes: means of political leverage or indoctrination or punishment for the exhibition or expression of political views or ideological beliefs contrary to the established political, social or economic system; methods for mobilizing and exploiting the workforce for the needs of economic development; means of promoting workplace discipline; and means of punishing people for their participation in strikes. However, the following are not deemed to be instances of forced labour: work performed as a result of a legally valid court ruling under the supervision of the authorities responsible for upholding the Law governing the execution of court rulings; work to be carried out as a consequence of legislation on military service or emergency situations. The Government has paid great attention to the comments made by the Committee of Experts. It has analysed all of the regulatory instruments referred to by the Committee of Experts, including the aims and purposes of adopting the instruments and the practice of applying them, with the aim of harmonizing the provisions of those instruments with the requirements of Convention No. 29. As a result of this work, taking into account the position of the Committee of Experts with regard to Presidential Decree No. 9 of 7 December 2012 on supplementary measures for the development of the wood processing industry, the decision was taken to start to repeal Decree No. 9. That decision has now been implemented. Presidential Decree No. 182 of 27 May 2016 has been adopted, which makes Decree No. 9 invalid. This information was received positively by the Committee of Experts which expressed satisfaction with the measures taken by the Government with regard to Decree No. 9, as reflected in paragraph 56 of the Report of the Committee of Experts. As regards the other regulatory instruments mentioned during the discussion at the Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2016, additional study of the situation was required. This task was entrusted to the Technical Advisory Mission of the International Labour Office, which visited the Republic of Belarus from 19 to 23 June 2017. The Government of the Republic of Belarus provided the Mission with all the necessary assistance in organizing their work. The Mission's report on the results of its work was submitted to the Committee of Experts. In the Government's opinion, the normative documents mentioned in the conclusions of the Committee of Experts are not at variance with the provisions of Convention No. 29. Presidential Decree No. 3 of 2 April on the prevention of dependency on social aid has undergone conceptual changes. On 25 January 2018, the Decree of the President of the Republic of Belarus No. 1 was adopted, in accordance with which Decree No. 3 was redrafted in a new version and given a new title – "On the Promotion of Employment of the Population". Now Decree No. 3 does not include any provisions on the payment, by unemployed citizens who are able to work, of a fee for financing public expenditures, as well as the rules on bringing to administrative responsibility for failure to pay the fee. The main task of the updated Decree No. 3 is to create more favourable conditions for citizens' employment in the regions of the republic. In this regard, significant increase in the activity of local authorities in assisting citizens in finding a job is envisaged. At the level of each region, all the available opportunities will be used to ensure that all citizens who, for some reason, do not work anywhere but want to work will be assisted in finding a job. Measures of active policy in the labour market will be used: training and re-training for professions that are in demand in the labour market; advisory and legal assistance in organizing private business with the provision of financial support from the State; and temporary employment of citizens, including through participation in paid public works.

The second important issue, which the new version of Decree No. 3 is designed to solve, is to create conditions that will stimulate citizens involved in the shadow economy to work legally with the payment of taxes. The Decree contains a direct material incentive for citizens to start working legally. Today, many public services in Belarus are provided to citizens at low tariffs, since the State subsidizes them from the budget. Therefore, it was decided that citizens who are able to work and who are classified as not involved in the economy in accordance with the procedure determined by the Government, will be provided with certain services at a higher, not subsidized tariff. At the moment, the procedure according to which citizens will be treated as not involved in the economy is determined by the Government. The Government has also determined the types of services that will be provided at prices ensuring full reimbursement of economically justified costs for the provision of these services, which include utilities such as: hot water, gas supply in the presence of individual gas heating appliances, as well as heat supply. This approach will be implemented starting from 1 January 2019, and as concerns gas and heat supply – starting from 1 October 2019. Presidential Decree No. 18 on supplementary measures for state protection of children from dysfunctional families was adopted on 24 November 2006. One of the most sensitive issues in any society is the situation of children from dysfunctional families and families in which parents lead an anti-social way of life, are alcoholics or drug addicts. Unfortunately, the critical issue regarding children whose parents are alcohol abusers, drug addicts or substance abusers is their very survival and the maintenance of their life and health. According to Decree No. 18, children are in a socially vulnerable situation if parents – or one parent – lead an immoral way of life that is harmful to the children, or if they are chronic alcoholics or drug addicts, or in some other way are unable to perform properly their obligations to raise and maintain children. These children are subject to state protection and are placed in state childcare facilities. The Decree defines a system by which state bodies may identify dysfunctional families and take decisions to place children in childcare facilities. Decree No. 18 focuses on working with parents. It is important to enable parents from dysfunctional families to turn away from their anti-social and, often immoral, way of life. This is the only way in which children can return to their biological families. However, many of these parents do not have work. Many of them lost their occupational skills long ago. It is extremely complicated for them to find work independently, because employers are not interested in workers of this kind. Decree No. 18 therefore provides for a work placement mechanism for parents from dysfunctional families whose children have been placed in state childcare facilities following a court order. Job placements are arranged at workplaces defined in coordination with the local authorities. Since, in accordance with Decree No. 18, a portion of the citizen's wage is deducted to compensate for the expenses associated with maintaining their children, one of the conditions in the selection of a workplace is that the wage level is sufficiently high. At the same time, if parents whose children have been placed in state childcare facilities have a job or find themselves work independently and can cover the costs of maintaining the child, no court decision is required. The main purpose of Decree No. 18 is to improve family situations so that children can safely return to their parents. During the time that Decree No. 18 has been in force (between 2007 and 2017), a total of 40,068 children have been recognized as needing state support, of which 23,255 children (more than 58 per cent) have been returned to their families and their parents.

The Law of 4 January 2010 "On the Procedure and Modalities for the Transfer of Citizens to Medical Labour Centres and the Conditions of Their Stay" regulates issues related to the transfer of citizens suffering from chronic alcoholism, drug addiction or substance abuse to medical labour centres. Not all individuals experiencing these problems may be transferred to medical labour centres, but only those who have repeatedly, three times or more in the course of a year, disturbed public order and been found in a state of intoxication from alcohol or caused by the use of drugs or other intoxicating substances. One further condition is that the individuals have already been warned about the possibility of returning to the centre if they commit further violations, but have nevertheless committed administrative offences for similar violations within a year of that warning. In addition, citizens may be sent to medical labour centres if they are obliged to compensate the child-rearing expenses incurred by the State and have twice violated work regulations during the year through alcohol or other substance abuse, and have furthermore been warned of the possibility of being sent to the centre, and yet have reoffended within a year of that warning. Citizens are sent to medical labour centres for a period of 12 months following a court ruling. The court may decide to extend the period of time spent in the centres or to curtail it by up to six months. Citizens placed in medical labour centres are required to undergo a medical examination to establish whether they suffer from chronic alcoholism, drug addiction and substance abuse. Social and medical rehabilitation measures may be used in relation to them, including the provision of medicines and of medical and psychological assistance. For citizens who lead an anti-social way of life, one of the most important means that ensure their social reintegration is through work. According to the Law, medico-social readaptation activities also include vocational guidance, vocational training, retraining, advanced training and labour. Over the years of the implementation of the Law, since 2010, 2,945 citizens have undergone vocational training in medical labour centres, and 876 citizens have taken part in continuing professional training programmes on the job. Employment of citizens who are placed in medical labour centres is carried out, taking into account their age, working capacity, state of health, specialization and qualifications. They are paid and granted leave from work and welfare-related forms of leave in accordance with labour laws. The Government considers that Decrees Nos 3 and 18 do not conflict with Convention No. 29. These regulatory instruments are aimed at addressing such socially important tasks as promoting employment of the population, protecting children and combating drunkenness and drug addiction. The approaches laid down in these instruments meet the requirements of justice and are socially justified.

In addition, before the Committee, a Government representative welcomed the opportunity to provide information on the application of the Convention by Belarus. In her opinion, the comments of the Committee of Experts were balanced, which could be explained by the fact that during consultations with ILO experts during the Technical Advisory Mission, the Government had been able to explain in detail its position on each legislative text and the Government's voice had been heard. The Committee of Experts had not pointed to violations of the Convention, but rather had requested the Government to continue to provide information on the implementation of the legislation in practice. Three legislative texts were mentioned by the Committee of Experts. In that respect, she indicated that Presidential Decree No. 3 on the prevention of dependency on social aid had been fundamentally altered. On 25 January 2018, Presidential Decree No. 1 had been adopted, pursuant to which a revised version of Decree No. 3 had been issued under a new title – "On the Promotion of Employment of the Population". As part of the implementation of the new Decree, ambitious and complex measures would be taken that went beyond the remit of the regional employment services. Other interested parties would need to be involved and their work coordinated. To that end, a permanent committee would be set up in each region, bringing together representatives of the executive authorities, local councils and public associations. The main way in which people would be encouraged to take up lawful labour activities was through a large-scale public information campaign to explain the guarantees offered by labour and social legislation. She further recalled that in 2016, when the Conference Committee had first discussed Presidential Decree No. 18 of 24 November 2006 on supplementary measures for state protection of children from “dysfunctional families”, the Government had provided detailed information on the objective pursued by the legislation and its application in practice. Decree No. 18 had also been discussed in detail with the experts of the ILO Technical Advisory Mission. Thus, the Office had already been given all the necessary information. She recalled that Decree No. 18 provided for a mechanism to employ parents whose children had been taken into State care. Job placements were arranged at workplaces identified in coordination with the local authorities. The list of organizations where such parents could be employed was drawn up and periodically reviewed in accordance with the decisions of the regional executive committees and the Minsk municipal executive committee. Finally, the Committee of Experts had examined Law No. 104-3 of 4 January 2010 on the procedures and modalities for the transfer of citizens to medical labour centres and the conditions of their stay, and the information submitted by the Government in this regard. In 2016, the Committee had suggested that the Government engage in a detailed discussion with ILO experts regarding the legislative texts mentioned in the Committee’s conclusions. This discussion had taken place. No violations had been identified.

The Worker members indicated that the case had been double footnoted and discussed at the 2016 session of the Committee and an ILO Technical Advisory Mission requested by the Committee had taken place in June 2017. Belarus was again on the agenda of the Committee, not because of an overall improvement, but for shortcomings with regard to its application of the Convention. Firstly, the repeal of Decree No. 9, which had prevented workers in the wood processing industry from exercising their right to freely leave their jobs, was noted as a positive point. In that regard, more information needed to be provided on the practical consequences of the withdrawal of the Decree, and on whether it had indeed led to improvements in the sector. However, many important points still posed serious problems of compliance with the Convention. Urgent action was still needed in order to bring the legislation into line with the Convention. Decree No. 3 provided that Belarusian citizens who had not worked for at least 183 days in the past year should pay a special tax to finance public expenditure. The Government had justified this measure on the grounds that these citizens, as they did not work, did not pay taxes on their labour income during the period in question. Those who were not able to pay this special tax were liable to sanctions, either in the form of a fine or administrative detention involving compulsory community service, following a decision by the civil court, not the criminal court. Moreover, the functioning of the labour centres where the persons concerned performed work was very opaque. No form of external control seemed to be applicable to what took place within them. It was thus important for health and safety inspectors to be able to carry out checks on the working conditions in these centres. In reality, this policy represented an additional punishment, which simply criminalized poverty. Not only were workers affected by poverty, but they also had to suffer the sanctions of the public authorities who made workers pay for their own policy failures. As previously noted, this was, in effect, a poverty tax. The Government was thus called upon to review this policy and to make real efforts to combat financial insecurity and poverty rather than penalizing the vulnerable and the poor. The difference was fundamental. The Government had announced that Decree No. 3 had been withdrawn and replaced by Decree No. 1 of 2018. According to the Belarusian Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (BKDP), Decree No. 1 still contained numerous discriminatory provisions against persons who were out of work, in particular by depriving them of free or reduced prices for certain services. The policy also aggravated gender inequality. When Decree No. 3 had still been in force, peaceful protests had taken place. It was of particular concern that citizens, including members of independent trade unions, who had participated in these peaceful protests, faced reprisals in the form of administrative sanctions and legal prosecutions. The restrictions on the right to peaceful protest and the repressive measures taken, were the direct consequence of the absence of the freedom of organization of trade unions, as had been already pointed out in the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry in 2004. It was to be hoped that a new regulation respecting the fundamental rights of unemployed citizens would be adopted following the repeal of Decree No. 3, and that the regulation would focus on combating unemployment and not the unemployed. The Government was urged to restore trade union rights in full and to consult all social partners in a meaningful dialogue when drafting new regulations. Another regulation that conflicted with the Convention was Law No. 104-3 of 2010, which provided for procedures and modalities for transferring citizens suffering from addiction to medical labour centres. In these centres, people were sent to work for a period of 12 to 18 months. The Government had responded that not all addicts were sent to these centres. Such individuals needed to have been arrested several times for disturbing the peace and served with a prior warning before they were sent to such a centre. According to the information provided by the Government, over 8,000 people had been sent to medical labour centres since 2016. The Government had painted a very flattering picture of these medical labour centres as examples of rehabilitation programmes for people suffering from addiction. However, the reality was quite different. These centres appeared to be places where vulnerable people were forced to work, when they should really be receiving genuine medical and social support.

There was also Decree No. 18 of 2006, which was designed to enable the withdrawal of children from the custody of parents with an immoral lifestyle, who suffered from addiction or who were unable to raise and care for their children. Such parents were expected to contribute to the costs incurred by public institutions for the care of their children. Parents who found themselves in such a situation and were unable to reimburse the costs might be sentenced to work. Even parents who were already working faced the risk of work being imposed on them. This decision might even lead to the persons in question being dismissed from their jobs, thus leaving them entirely subject to the arbitrariness of the public authorities. Such a sentence was senseless, counterproductive and disproportionate. Moreover, parents who did not comply with the sentence were liable to criminal sanctions that could include a period of up to two years of community service or corrective labour. Apparently, there was a list of 6,770 companies willing to offer employment to people who were the subject of such decisions. It would be useful to have more information about the conditions under which these companies could make use of such a vulnerable labour force. The BKDP had also reported one case in which Presidential Decree No. 18 was used for political purposes: parents whose political views opposed the authorities had been deprived of the custody of their children, despite living in a normal and healthy situation. It was hoped that the Government could provide more information in that regard. It was notable that most issues regarding compliance with the Convention found their source in Presidential Decrees. It appeared that decrees occupied a higher place in the hierarchy of the Belarusian legal system than laws. This concentration of powers seemed to lead to too many authoritarian excesses that were putting Belarus at odds with many international standards, including Convention No. 29. The Government was thus invited to involve the social partners in matters relating to social legislation. Decree No. 29, which had been pointed out by the Commission of Inquiry in 2004 as being especially problematic, was still of great concern to the Worker members. The Decree ordered employers to transfer all workers to fixed-term labour contracts, and in fact nullified the provisions of the Labour Code, which prohibited temporary contracts for any person whose job was of a permanent nature. According to Decree No. 29, a worker was not free to leave fixed-term employment and could request early termination of the agreement only on the basis of a limited number of specific reasons, such as illness or the violation of labour laws by the employer. In practice, the legitimacy of the reason was determined by the employer. That suggested that a person working under temporary employment conditions could not leave his or her job during the term of the contract without the agreement of the employer. This Decree was also used as a tool for anti-union discrimination. Transfer to less desirable forms of employment had been used to punish activists and members of independent trade unions, and a disproportionate number of trade union activists and members had not had their contracts renewed when they expired. There was a clear link between the flagrant lack of freedom of association in Belarus and the use of forced labour.

The Employer members noted that this case was about the relationship between social measures and the general prohibition of forced labour. The Convention required member States to suppress the use of forced or compulsory labour in the shortest possible period, although recourse to forced labour could be had during a transitional period for public purposes, as an exceptional measure. On the basis of the Committee of Experts' observation, this case had been reviewed by the Committee in 2016 as a double-foot-noted case, designating very serious violations. It was to be noted with satisfaction that, as observed by the Committee of Experts, Decree No. 9 had been repealed. Another text reviewed in 2016 had been Decree No. 3, which had put in place the payment of labour taxes, and if those were not paid, compulsory work. The information provided to the Committee of Experts, and now to this Committee, indicated that a new conceptual framework had been adopted to amend Decree No. 3. The new framework shifted the focus from fiscal measures to the promotion of employment and the reduction of illegal employment. It should be recalled that the Technical Advisory Mission had strongly recommended that the text to amend Decree No. 3 should be prepared in consultation with the social partners. The Employer members requested further information on the new conceptual framework with a view to understanding its potential relationship to forced labour and urged the Government to provide a full report on the amendment process as well as its practical and legal implications. With regard to Law No. 104-3, the Employer members had previously acknowledged the Government's indication that work in medical labour centres was intended to reintegrate individuals into society and to provide them with career guidance and skills training. At that time, the Government had been asked to provide further information regarding the obligation to work during confinement. While taking note of the complex links between social measures and the obligations under the Convention, the Employer members asked the Government to provide practical information on the placing of individuals in such centres. Decree No. 18 authorized the removal of children from their families and instituted a corresponding requirement for those parents to pay for the care of those children. Such parents who were unemployed or unable to pay were subject to an obligation to work, pursuant to a court ruling. They noted that further information would advance understanding of the practical functioning of this Decree, as it was important to ensure that its application did not exceed the purpose of rehabilitation and that it was not used as a method to exact forced labour. The Employer members asked the Government to review whether the provisions created conditions of forced labour in practice, and requested its continued cooperation with the ILO.

The Worker member of Belarus noted with satisfaction that the Committee of Experts had noted significant progress made towards compliance with the Convention. He questioned the inclusion of his country, once again, among the cases examined by the Committee. In keeping with the relevant international standards, the national legislation prohibited forced labour. In practice, there were no cases of compulsory labour in the country. Regarding several legislative texts examined by the Committee of Experts, it was important to highlight that Decree No. 3 had been amended by new Decree No. 1 in January 2018, following broad public consultations, and on the basis of the observations of ILO experts and the opinion of the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus (FPB) and its member organizations. The amended Decree focused on two tasks: the promotion of employment and the encouragement of a transition from the informal to the formal economy. That would further allow the Government to better understand in which regions labour markets faced difficulties and to establish targeted national plans of action to create jobs. At the local level, interdepartmental commissions were being created to assist individuals to find suitable work. These commissions included representatives of trade unions and other public organizations. The legalization of the shadow economy was a significant concern, as every citizen needed to pay taxes. Tax evasion and the concealment of income were crimes in any country. All countries had developed tools and strategies to confront this phenomenon through creation of conditions in which citizens would be employed legally. Decree No. 1 required able-bodied citizens, who had no objective reason to avoid work, to pay for communal services at full rates, without state subsidies. It did not provide for administrative or criminal penalties that had been criticized previously. The new text established simplified processes for creating businesses, which provided additional opportunities for self-employment, and for the registration of activities of the self-employed and of small and medium-sized enterprises. Thus, no further discussion was required by the Committee on this subject. Regarding Decree No. 18, the objective of which was to protect the children removed from "dysfunctional" families, he recalled that any obligation to work in order to reimburse the State for the fees covering the care and education of children was decided by the courts. Finally, regarding Law No. 104-3, citizens suffering from chronic alcoholism, drug addiction or substance abuse and who had been involved repeatedly in administrative and other offences were sent to special institutions for medical and social rehabilitation. This measure was also applied exclusively on the basis of a court ruling and was under the control and supervision of relevant public bodies; it therefore did not create conditions of forced labour.

The Employer member of Belarus referred to the practical steps taken by the Government, which included the repeal of Decree No. 9, the acceptance of the ILO technical assistance provided by the Technical Advisory Mission and the revision of Decree No. 3 by a new Decree adopted on 25 January 2018. The new Decree defined a set of measures to improve assistance for finding employment for those who wanted to work. The main role in implementing such measures was assigned to local authorities. The new Decree did not provide for the use of forced or compulsory labour, nor for the payment of a special fee to finance public expenditure. Rather, it created a situation in which it became unprofitable to work illegally. That was not in contradiction with the Convention. The employers in Belarus realized their social responsibility in the processes of the labour and social rehabilitation of certain categories of citizens referred to in Law No. 104-3 and Decree No. 18. The Law established a way to resolve problems of alcoholism and drug addiction. Along with measures of a medical nature, labour was one of the means of rehabilitation. Decree No. 18 provided for the State protection of children of “dysfunctional” families, ensuring their rights and legitimate interests. Parents who did not work and could not reimburse the State for the costs of the care of their children were subject to employment by a court decision. Both within the framework of the Law, and within the framework of the Decree, labour was not used as a punishment, but as an aid for rehabilitation. Employers provided such citizens with work, taking into account their state of health and, if possible, profession. They organized their vocational education or retraining, and participated in creating the necessary housing and living conditions. Despite the fact that this imposed an additional burden, employers in Belarus considered that both legislative texts were necessary. The existing legislation did not contain elements of forced labour and was supported and understood by the majority of the population as it aimed at addressing such socially important tasks as the protection of children, combating alcohol and drug addiction, and promoting employment. Employers in Belarus were committed to collaborating with the ILO and the Committee on a basis of mutual understanding and respect.

The Government member of Bulgaria, speaking on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States, as well as the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Montenegro, Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Norway, reiterated that cases of forced labour remained a persistent phenomenon in Belarus. This case was being discussed for the second time since 2016, when the Committee had urged the Government to constructively engage with the ILO at the highest levels to resolve this issue before its next sitting and to avail itself of ILO technical assistance. She welcomed the fact that the ILO mission had taken place in 2017. With regard to compulsory labour imposed by the national legislation, she welcomed the fact that Decree No. 9 had been revoked and that Decree No. 3 had been suspended. She noted with concern, however, that a new Decree, replacing Decree No. 3 had been adopted in January 2018. She requested the Government to provide information on the purpose of the new Decree and to ensure that its provisions did not lead to situations amounting to compulsory labour. Decree No. 18 was also a matter of concern. In that respect, she called on the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the implementation of the Decree did not go beyond the purpose of rehabilitating “dysfunctional” families, and in particular, that it was not used for political purposes. In line with the Committee of Experts’ recommendations, she encouraged the Government to consider revising the provisions respecting the direct deduction of wages from persons in order to compensate for the expenses of maintaining their children in State child-care facilities. Finally, she noted that, pursuant to Law No. 104-3, persons interned in medical labour centres had an obligation to work or were otherwise subject to punishment, such as solitary confinement. She thanked the Government representative for the information provided on the implementation of this Law and on the number of persons who had been placed in these facilities and encouraged the Government to continue providing such information and to indicate whether the decision regarding the internment was of a judicial or an administrative nature.

An observer representing the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) said that the Government had failed to comply with the Committee’s previous request to abandon forced labour practices and to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The edicts, decrees and laws which had introduced forced labour had not been repealed. Those that had been amended had not changed in essence. Decree No. 29, which imposed fixed-term labour contracts on all workers, continued to operate. Excessive use of such contracts amounted to an escalation of forced labour as the employees could not resign before the expiry of their contracts. Decree No. 5 was still in force. It introduced a stringent criteria for hiring and a disproportionate system of punishment and fines, which in practice meant that workers’ employment relations became coercive. There was now a threat that the provisions of Decrees Nos 5 and 29 would be included in the Labour Code, as the Government had introduced a draft law to that effect. The system of forced labour in medical labour centres, where alcoholics were sent, continued to function. Parents whose children had been removed were still being forced to work. The practice of compulsory “subbotnik” was flourishing. Decree No. 3, which had obliged the unemployed to pay a fee to the State, which had caused mass protests in the spring of 2017, had not been repealed. This Decree had become Decree No. 1, which had replaced the fee with an obligation imposed upon citizens to pay for state-provided services. Forcing the unemployed to work was a violation of the Constitution of the country, which provided for the right, and not the duty, to work. He concluded by emphasizing that compulsory labour did not solve problems, but rather created them.

The Government member of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela said that forced labour should be eliminated in every part of the world. He welcomed the fact that, in its 2018 report, the Committee of Experts had noted with satisfaction the information provided by the Government, as a 2012 presidential decree contested by the Committee of Experts had been rendered null and void in 2016. He acknowledged the wide range of legislation that had been referred to, as well as the fact that Decree No. 3 and Decree No. 18 provided for strategies based on the criteria of justice and were geared towards society. Taking into account the Government’s willingness and commitment, the Committee should bear in mind the positive aspects to be taken from the explanations and arguments given in the present case. He trusted that the Committee’s conclusions would be objective and well-balanced. If that were the case, the Government would be able to consider and assess them within the framework of the implementation of the Convention, and there would be no need for the case to be reconsidered by the Committee.

The Worker member of Turkey stated that forced labour practices had been diversified under the influence of global competition and neo-liberalism and that practices of overworking and low wages had increased. Evaluation of the forced labour situation in a country and the final decision, should be based first and foremost on the views of the representatives of the labour force in a country. In the context of globalization, it was the joint and unavoidable responsibility of all the social partners to tackle the problem of forced labour. The information provided by the FPB, the main organization representing the workers in Belarus, should be the main elements taken into account by the Committee. It appeared that no information or document had clearly indicated that forced labour existed in the country.

The Government member of Turkmenistan welcomed the provisions that had been introduced into national legislation in order to eliminate forced labour. The legislative activities, aimed at clarifying and further amending Decree No. 3, was a positive response to the previous recommendations of the Committee. The Government’s collaboration with the ILO and the social partners with a view to implementing international Conventions and protecting labour rights was welcome. The 2017 ILO technical mission to

Belarus (ratification: 1956)

Belarus had demonstrated the commitment of the Government to comply with its obligations. Therefore the issue of the implementation of the Convention in Belarus should be removed from the agenda of the Committee.

The Worker member of Germany indicated that the right to work protected the freedom not to work, as well as the right to choose a profession freely. The prohibition of forced labour, as provided for in the Convention safeguarded that freedom. The Government was violating that prohibition to a considerable extent, especially with respect to persons living in precarious conditions, such as young people, people addicted to narcotic substances, and so-called “dysfunctional” families. University graduates funded from State sources would be assigned to work for one to two years after their studies. Those who did not complete this work might be required to compensate the State. The European Commission had already criticized this practice. People addicted to alcohol or other substances were admitted to so-called medical labour centres for a period of up to a year and a half, if they committed offences under the influence of the substances. They were de facto imprisoned there, and were obliged to work under often inhumane conditions. It was completely disproportionate to deprive them of their freedom merely on the basis of administrative violations. Inhumane conditions at these centres, in some cases, amounted to attempted suicide in protest. Children whose parents were alcoholics, drug addicts, or were considered to have “an immoral lifestyle” might be enrolled in care facilities operated by the State. If their parents were unemployed or unable to pay the full cost for the care, they would be compelled to work by a civil court. Such a court decision might be grounds for termination of an existing employment relationship. If they refused to comply with the decision, they faced criminal consequences, which could in turn result in forced labour. Children were also victims in such cases, as they were also traumatized by the separation from their parents. Although the Government had now withdrawn Decree No. 3, there was still a constant threat of forced labour. This situation was in stark contradiction with the basic principles of the Convention. She called on the Government to bring its law and practice into line with the Convention.

The Government member of the Russian Federation considered that the Government of Belarus had taken into account the comments and recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies and interacted constructively with the ILO and the social partners. Decree No. 9 had been repealed. The Government had also carried out a comprehensive analysis of the national legislation. In 2017, Belarus had hosted an ILO technical advisory mission. The Government’s efforts to introduce elements of active labour market policies and to create conditions that would encourage people to take businesses out of informality could not be ignored. Those measures were aimed at the future and were in conformity with modern trends in the world of work. The steps taken by the Government deserved the most positive assessment. The speaker called on the Committee to take note of the information provided by the Government with satisfaction.

An observer representing IndustriALL Global Union expressed his deep concern at the developments taking place in Belarus. The problematic issue remained Decree No. 3, as revised by Decree No. 1 of 2018. The Government claimed that the new Decree would be beneficial to the people. However, it was difficult to understand how the revision could be considered as a positive improvement, as the new Decree returned to the same logic of punishing unemployed workers who would have to pay full cost of public services subsidized by the State. In addition, the new Decree established a mechanism to collect the private information of workers, which could be further shared at all levels of the State structure. The absence of proper protection of privacy would likely lead to a higher number of violations of workers’ rights. In fact, the newly adopted Decree would force employees to stay in jobs even if the conditions were precarious and the pay was low. Moreover, since August 2018, there had been an obvious effort to eliminate independent trade union organizations, including member organizations of IndustriALL. The Chairperson of the Radio and Electronic Industry Workers’ Union, Mr Gennady Fedynich, was subject to prosecution, and faced up to seven years of imprisonment. Although the case had been officially announced as only related to economic reasons, about 800 members of the union had been summoned and questioned as part of the investigation. In addition, Mr Fedynich was part of IndustriALL’s delegation to the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference, but was not able to participate in the present sitting, as he had been banned from travelling abroad. In light of that case and the union’s active participation in the protests against Decree No. 3, the criminal prosecutions were a clear case of retaliation for the previous union engagement in the protests. They were an attempt to eliminate those who opposed the new Decree. He thus expected and demanded that the Government respect, and guarantee fundamental trade union rights in the country.

The Government member of India appreciated the comprehensive update provided by the Government, and welcomed its willingness and commitment to constructively engage and cooperate with the ILO and to fulfil its obligations. He requested the Government to continue pursuing its efforts to amend the relevant laws in consultation with the relevant stakeholders, especially the social partners, and to continue providing information on any progress made in this regard. He also called on the ILO and its member States to fully support the Government and to provide any technical assistance that it might seek in this regard. The Committee should be a forum for constructive discussion aimed at improving compliance with international labour standards. He reiterated the need for ensuring greater transparency, inclusiveness, objectivity, fairness and credibility in the ILO supervisory mechanism as part of the Centenary Standards Initiative.

An observer representing the General Confederation of Trade Unions acknowledged that steps towards implementation of international labour standards had been taken by the Government in coordination with the social partners, including trade unions. Legislative processes took time. The constructive dialogue that had been established between the Government and the ILO had led to positive outcomes beyond the application of the Convention and extended to the application of other Conventions. They included the expansion of the mandate of the national tripartite council, the development of a mechanism for collective bargaining in enterprises with several trade unions, and the repeal of the 10 per cent membership requirement for establishing a trade union. These advances did not, however, mean that all the problems had been resolved. Inconsistencies in the application of the Convention and the lack of conformity between certain national provisions and those of the Convention that had been identified by the Committee of Experts, illustrated the need to pursue dialogue between the ILO and the Government. He therefore welcomed the willingness of the ILO to provide technical assistance and trusted that a positive resolution would be forthcoming.

The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran noted that the prohibition of forced labour in Belarus was enshrined in both its Constitution and its Labour Code. The ILO Technical Advisory Mission had visited the country in 2017. Decree No. 1 had been adopted. The Government had demonstrated its willingness to improve the situation. He supported the measures taken by the Government and encouraged it to continue taking further measures. He requested the ILO to provide any further assistance to the Government in this respect.

The Worker member of Sudan pointed out that analysis of local labour laws showed that there were no provisions which would lead to forced labour. Therefore, the legislation was fully in line with international labour standards. Belarus was also fully in compliance with all the international Conventions that it had ratified. The ILO Technical Advisory Mission had visited the country in 2017 and provided the necessary technical assistance, which had led to the improvement of the relevant legislation. He thanked the Government for all its efforts in that regard and for the information provided to the Committee.

The Government member of Switzerland expressed concern at the provisions in the national legislation requiring certain groups of workers to perform compulsory labour. He took note of the work of the Technical Advisory Mission in June 2017. The changes noted or made in practice showed that things were moving in the right direction. The Government had assured the mission that public consultations, including with the social partners, would be held in line with the amended version of Decree No. 3. The Government was also invited to continue its efforts to bring its laws and practice into line with international labour standards, with the involvement of all stakeholders, to continue working with the ILO and to provide all the information requested on medical labour centres.

The Government member of China welcomed the information provided by the Government. Since the examination of the case by the Committee in 2016, progress had been made in implementing the Convention, including the improvement of legislation related to forced labour and of the capacity for law enforcement. For example, Decree No. 9 had been repealed. Decree No. 3 had been suspended and revised. To amend other relevant laws and regulations, the Government had undertaken to seek the views of the social partners and the public. It was the obligation of member States to apply ratified international labour Conventions. To strengthen their capacity in this regard, enhanced dialogue and technical assistance was the most effective approach. He hoped that the ILO would further its cooperation with the Government and provide the necessary technical assistance to solve the problem regarding the application of the Convention.

The Worker member of the Russian Federation indicated that special attention was paid in the Russian Federation to labour rights in Belarus because changes in Belarusian legislation that worsened the situation of workers could have an impact on the Russian legal system. He recalled the concerns raised in 2016 regarding the regulation of labour relations in Belarus and the Government's intention to institute a fee for non-working citizens which, if unpaid, could entail more serious measures, including administrative arrest. Fixed-term employment contracts that offered workers no guarantee of permanent employment were the norm, and employers commonly refused to conclude a contract in writing with employees. Yet rather than giving the State Labour Inspectorate the authority to identify and suppress such cases, Decree No. 1 would, as of 1 January 2019, unjustly inflate utility payments for housing for formally unemployed citizens. Given the shortage of jobs offering decent working conditions in Belarus, such measures would place an additional burden on workers. Fears regarding Decree No. 3 had proved justified. As a result of the civil protests in February 2018, the Decree had been suspended, but trade union activists who had participated in the protests were still being persecuted on what were considered unreasonable legal grounds, setting the stage for violations of workers' rights of freedom of association. He called on the Government to take into account the conclusions of the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts, and to make the necessary amendments to bring the legislation into line with the provisions of the Convention.

The Government member of Kazakhstan considered that Belarus was on the path of rapid development of social dialogue at all levels of social partnership. ILO membership allowed the Government to study and apply international practices in resolving social and labour disputes, developing social partnerships, and improving and regulating the labour market. The Government cooperated with the ILO on various issues, including employment. The information provided by the delegation of Belarus was complete. The ILO mission in 2017, as well as the latest legislative changes, inspired confidence that the Government would continue its interaction with the social partners and the ILO to resolve all the issues raised by the Committee. Decent working conditions could only be created through negotiations and legislation that was in conformity with international labour standards.

The Government member of Cuba thanked the Government for the information provided. She emphasized that the advisory mission of June 2017 was proof that the Government was willing to collaborate with the ILO. She trusted that the Government would continue its efforts to improve working conditions and ensure better protection for children and families, while also considering the legislative amendments that were necessary.

The Government representative thanked the members of the Committee for the discussion and indicated that all constructive suggestions and comments would be taken and examined. Belarus was a consistent supporter of the prohibition and eradication of forced labour. The prohibition of forced labour was enshrined in the Constitution as well as in section 13 of the Labour Code. Any exception to this principle could be permitted only by the courts pursuant to the Law on emergency and martial law. She reiterated that Decree No. 9 had been repealed, as the Committee of Experts had noted with satisfaction, and thus, this case should be considered resolved. She recalled that Decree No. 29 had been the subject of criticism by the Committee in 2016. The contents of the Decree had been studied by the experts during the Technical Advisory Mission, who had informed the Committee of Experts of their conclusions. Having analyzed all the necessary information, the Committee of Experts had chosen not to comment on Decree No. 29. The contents of an employment contract, its terms and working conditions, were determined by agreement between the parties, namely the employer and the employee. Neither party had the right to coerce the other party or impose unacceptable conditions. The terms of an employment contract should take into account the mandatory minimum guarantees established by labour law. Such an approach corresponded to internationally recognized practices. The comments of the Committee of Experts had become the basis for additional and thorough analysis by the Government of the application of the national legislation. The Government had also studied three regulatory acts – Decrees Nos 3 and 18; and Law No. 104-3 – and had provided detailed information on their application, which covered very limited categories of citizens who, without the active involvement of the State and society, could not return to normal life. Providing those individuals with an opportunity to work was one of the most important and effective means of their social rehabilitation and reintegration. That approach was consistent with the position of the Committee of Experts, which had been indicated in the 1979 and 2007 General Surveys on the Convention, in particular regarding the long-term unemployed who did not want to work and, for that reason, had no livelihood. In conclusion, she assured the members of the Committee that the Government would continue to be a staunch and consistent supporter of the principles of the ILO. The Government valued its interaction with the ILO, and was ready for further cooperation to improve social and labour relations in Belarus.

The Employer members acknowledged the submissions commending the constructive interaction between the Government and the ILO and the development of social partnership and of the labour market. They took note of the amendments to certain legislative texts, the Government's explanation of the conceptual changes to Decree No. 3, as amended by Decree No. 1, and the repeal of Decree No. 9 by Edict No. 182 of 27 May 2016. Taking into account the submissions regarding the social and rehabilitative value of work, they urged the Government to continue to take all the necessary measures to suppress the use of forced labour, and to refrain from enacting legislation that could amount to the use of forced labour. They asked the Government to provide the Committee of Experts with information confirming the amendment of Decree No. 3 by Decree No. 1, as well as details on the operation of the new legal framework and its effect in practice. They further requested the Government to submit information on the implementation of Law No. 104-3 in practice, including on the number of persons placed in medical centres and the compulsory work that formed part of this rehabilitation.

The Worker members thanked the Government representative for the information provided to the Committee. However, they expressed regret that the Government did not appear to realize the serious shortcomings in its regulation in relation to the Convention. In view of the limited progress on the points addressed, a number of recommendations that had been made in 2016 needed to be reiterated. The Government was urged to take all the necessary measures to end forced labour and to refrain from adopting legislation that could give rise to forced labour. Many groups of the population were likely to be subject to sanctions imposing compulsory work. Particularly vulnerable groups were those who had not worked more than 183 days over a given period, those who suffered from addiction and parents who were unable to take care of their children. In this regard, the Government was called upon to ensure that its decrees and legislation fully complied with the Convention, in particular Decree No. 1 amending Decree No. 3, Law No. 104-3, Decree No. 18 and Decree No. 29. This task should be carried out in close cooperation with all the social partners in Belarus. The Government was thus invited to consult all the social partners when developing regulatory measures to ensure their compliance with the Convention. More attention needed to be paid to the situation in medical labour centres. The Government was therefore asked to provide the Committee of Experts with information on the supervisions carried out by the labour inspectorates in these centres. In order to eliminate all forms of forced labour, those who had imposed forced labour should be prosecuted and, if found guilty, punished with dissuasive civil and criminal sanctions. While the repeal of Decree No. 9 had been confirmed, the effects of the repeal were not yet clear. It would be useful to obtain information in this regard in order to assess whether there had been any improvement in light of the Convention. Moreover, the situation regarding freedom of association in Belarus was extremely worrying. The exercise of this freedom was severely restricted, which did not allow workers to make their voice heard effectively. In order to implement all the above recommendations, the Government was urged to seek ILO technical assistance. In order to speed up the process of bringing Belarusian legislation and practice into line with the Convention, it was also urged to accept a direct contacts mission by the ILO.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral statements made by the Government representative and the discussion that followed.

Further to the Committee's 2016 conclusions and the Government's actions as a result, the Committee noted the Government's explanation of the conceptual changes to the framework of Presidential Decree No. 3 of 2 April 2015 as amended by Decree No. 1 of 25 January 2018 and the repeal of Decree No. 9 of 7 December 2012 by Presidential Decree No. 182 of 27 May 2016. However, the Committee noted with concern the possible exaction of forced labour as a result of the operation of the other Presidential Decrees, which have not been amended.

Taking into account the Government's submissions and the discussion that followed, the Committee recommended the Government to:

- continue to take all measures to suppress the use of forced labour and refrain from enacting legislation that may amount to the use of forced labour in full compliance with Convention No. 29;
- provide to the Committee of Experts information related to the operation of the provisions of Presidential Decree No. 182 in law and its effect in practice;
- provide to the Committee of Experts information confirming the amendment of Presidential Decree No. 3 by Presidential Decree No. 1, including information related to the operation of this new framework in law and practice;
- continue to provide information on the implementation of Law No. 104-3 in practice including the number of persons who are placed in medical centres and the compulsory work that forms part of this rehabilitation; and
- continue to accept technical assistance to ensure continued measures to achieve compliance with Convention No. 29 in law and practice.

The Committee encouraged the Government to continue to constructively engage with the ILO to work to suppress the use of forced labour and to report on these measures at the next meeting of the Committee of Experts.

The Government representative indicated that her Government was committed to compliance with international labour standards and would send additional information to the Committee of Experts to facilitate a better understanding of measures taken to implement the Convention. She underlined that the purpose of the measures taken by her Government was to combat certain undesirable phenomena such as alcoholism and drug addiction through assistance, rehabilitation and support services to protect children.

ERITREA (ratification: 2000)

A Government representative stated that the observations made on 30 August 2017 by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the comments made by the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee in this regard had been noted by the Government. In 2000, Eritrea had ratified both forced labour Conventions and always remained engaged in matters related to the Conventions. The Eritrean struggle was not only for independence, but also for social justice and ensuring its rights from the colonial rulers. Regarding the issue of compulsory national service, the Government's position needed to be reiterated as it had been stated in the Conference Committee in 2015. He hoped that the discussion would lead to a clear understanding of the issue and a fruitful conclusion. The national service programme was at the centre of nation building and the upbringing and preparedness of the new generation towards that end. Eritrea had introduced the national service programme in 1995 through Proclamation No. 82/1995 against the backdrop of massive demobilization of the Eritrean Liberation Army after independence. In certain ways, it was also seen as a contingent security architecture which would allow the young nation to maintain a very small regular army with the latitude to mobilize the necessary force if and when it faced existential threats. The need for a dynamic effort for a robust framework of regional security and development was also considered essential. In normal times, national service by law was limited to 18 months, 12 months of which were generally spent on public works in community or development assignments and the remaining six months on military training in the Sawa Education and Training Centre. They were also part of the reserve army eligible for recall if and when war broke out or any demand arose due to any national security challenge. This was compatible with the definition of “normal civic obligation” provided for by Article 2(2)(b) of the Convention. The work exacted was aimed at the best interests of the nation and the community, not for the benefit of private companies or individuals. It focused on reforestation, soil and water conservation, reconstruction projects and food security programmes. Overall, the purpose for which it was used was limited to what was strictly required in the prevailing situation as a pre-requisite for the existence of the nation. The national service programme had been affected by existential external threats over the past 20 years. Ethiopia’s continued occupation of sovereign Eritrean territories constituted a flagrant violation of international law, fundamental provisions of the United Nations Charter and the 2000 Algiers Agreement signed by the two countries. It also constituted a violation of the Eritrean people’s right to sovereignty, development and the right to live in peace without any threats. However, the international community, in particular the United Nations Security Council (UNSC), had not taken any appropriate measures to address the problem. Consequently, Eritrea had no option but to take the necessary measures of self-defence that were proportionate to the threat it faced.

Despite the prevailing challenges, the Government had taken various measures to transform the national service system and address the unintended consequences. For example: (1) the Commission for Demobilization had been established in 2001 and had demobilized over 105,000 soldiers from national service from 2001 to 2005. The project envisaged the full demobilization of the army, but had been discontinued when Ethiopia rejected the decision of the Eritrea Ethiopia Boundary Commission; (2) large scale demobilization practices had continued on various grounds through local resources, especially for women and other segments of society; (3) in the past five or six years, all graduates of the national service programme had been directly enrolled in different education institutions and deployed in various areas of work after finishing their studies. The one year of community or development service in most cases was thus deferred to take place at any convenient time. Most of the recent graduates were covered by the new remuneration system established in 2016, which had introduced a substantial increase in the salary of the civil service; and (4) the communal services were intended to promote social service and the dignified life of the population. Members of the community were frequently consulted through the popular local governance system and were involved both as beneficiaries and active participants on the need for such services. Due to the prevailing situation described repeatedly, national service members were called upon to perform non-military activities in the specific circumstances described, which was confined to genuine cases of force majeure. In times of peace, national service members did not have any other obligations once they had fulfilled their obligation of service for 18 months. The duration of national service had been prolonged due to unrelenting threats and a protracted state of belligerency by Ethiopia. Therefore, the extended obligations imposed on the population in general and national service members in particular were compatible with the provisions of Conventions Nos 29 and 105. Neither forced nor compulsory labour had been exacted in the country in violation of the Conventions. In terms of the legal and institutional context of the State, national service constituted an exception to forced labour under article 3(17) of Labour Proclamation No. 118/2001, which provided that normal civic obligations, labour performed as stipulated in the Penal Code and communal or development services rendered in the situation of existential external threats were not considered as forced labour. The legitimacy of the ongoing practice of qualifying military and non-military service as force majeure under Convention No. 29 was thus unambiguous. He emphasized that peace, security, human rights and development were interlinked and constituted a fundamental principle of the international system. The existential external threats faced by Eritrea and the failure of the international community, in particular the UNSC, to address the pertinent threats faced by Eritrea could not be underestimated. The Government of Eritrea categorically rejected the allegations made and reiterated its stated position that the Committee had to consider these objective realities, drop the allegations and continue to expand and strengthen engagement with Eritrea in a meaningful way. Regarding the IOE’s claim that “the illegal occupation of Eritrean territory by Ethiopia does not amount to a genuine situation of emergency and, as such, recourse to compulsory labour couldn’t be justified”, he stated that it negated the concrete reality in the country, the fundamental principle of the international system on the interdependence of peace, security and development, as well as the provisions of Article 1(b) of the Convention. Contrary to the IOE’s assertion, Eritrea did not exploit forced or compulsory labour for economic development as a systemic approach aimed to replace the labour system. All forms of compulsory labour exacted in Eritrea met the criteria of minor communal services. This work, accomplished under the duress of existential threats, was consistent with the parameters provided for in Convention No. 29. Moreover, it also warranted the mobilization of labour for the purpose of economic development in the context of Convention No. 105. In line with the ratified Conventions on forced labour and its abolition, and following the border war with Ethiopia, the Committee had requested Eritrea to provide reports and information, indicating that work exacted from the population as part of compulsory national service in Eritrea was equated to forced labour. The Government of Eritrea had provided several written reports and information to the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts indicating that no forced labour had been practiced in the Bisha Mine. In conclusion, he hoped that all the efforts made so far, including the information included in this statement, would instil an objective understanding of the prevailing reality leading to the termination of unwarranted allegations of forced labour and related observations. He also reiterated the Government’s commitment to continue its engagement with the relevant bodies in the future.

The Worker members recalled the gravity of the issue and the inability of the Government to resolve it satisfactorily, even though the use of forced labour in Eritrea had already been discussed during the 104th Session of the International Labour Conference in 2015, since when the Government had not requested technical assistance from the Office. The alarming events reported in 2015 (murders, torture, kidnappings, inhuman detention conditions) remained the same in 2018 and had been confirmed by many international bodies, such as the United Nations Commission of Inquiry on Human Rights in Eritrea in June 2016, and the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Eritrea in June 2017. Poor diplomatic relations with Ethiopia could not be used to justify the serious violations that were occurring. It was to be hoped that the Committee’s 2018 discussion would convince the Eritrean Government to make every effort to bring its legislation and practice into line with the Convention. Compulsory national service, pursuant to the Proclamation on National Service No. 82 of 1995 and the 2002 statement concerning the Warsai Yakaalo Development Campaign (WYDC), remained the source of the problem. Although national service was time-limited in theory, the WYDC had allowed conscripts to be mobilized for an unspecified period. Moreover, national service involved various activities, such as construction and agriculture, that were not purely military and therefore fell outside the scope of the exception provided for in Article 2(2) of the Convention. As the Committee of Experts had recalled, that condition was explicitly intended to prevent the requisitioning of conscripts for the performance of public works or development work. However, it had been reported that some conscripts had been made available to private enterprises, particularly in the mining sector. The Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), also prohibited the exaction of forced labour as a method of mobilizing and using labour for the purpose of economic development. That was how Convention No. 29 should be interpreted. One of the stated objectives of the WYDC was precisely “investing in development work of our people as a potential wealth”, that is, promoting economic development. A further exception to the prohibition of forced or compulsory labour provided for in the Convention was force majeure, defined in a restrictive manner as a sudden, unforeseen happening calling for instant counter-measure. However, in view of the extremely long periods for which the workforce was required, it could not be considered that the Eritrean Government was mobilizing a large proportion of its population to deal with a sudden and unforeseeable event. It could not, therefore, invoke the force majeure exception. The Government took the view that such measures were intended to prevent future instances of force majeure. Such an interpretation, quite apart from being incompatible with the unpredictable nature inherent in force majeure, was unacceptable, as it would allow States to take measures that seriously restricted fundamental rights against the possibility of a hypothetical force majeure, which would set a dangerous precedent.

The institutionalization of forced labour was evidenced by the serious penalties incurred by Eritreans who sought to avoid the obligation, including prison sentences, suspension of rights, reprisals against family members, and non-renewal of trading licences. Forced or compulsory labour was defined in Article 2(1) of the Convention as all work or service which was exacted from any person under the menace of any penalty and for which the said person had not offered himself voluntarily. The Worker members reiterated their concern with regard to the impact of the WYDC on women and children. Although the law stated that national service was to be performed from the age of 18, various reports indicated that almost one third of new conscripts in military training centres were below that age. Students who completed their studies were obliged to submit to intensive military training in SAWA and then to continue their studies under military authority. They were then transferred directly to the national service programme. Very often students had to work in agriculture, sometimes for up to one or two months, in addition to their military training and their studies. Women were particularly vulnerable to harassment and sexual violence. They were also forced to perform domestic work for officers, in addition to their work in the framework of their compulsory military service. It was regrettable that the measures taken to demobilize conscripts and reintegrate them into the public service, including through the determination of a wage scale for those who had fulfilled their obligations and the establishment of a specific status for them, had been abandoned. It was to be hoped that the Government would relaunch that process. The Government’s statement that the objectives of the WYDC were confined to what was strictly necessary to respond to the requirements of the national situation were tantamount to adding a criterion to the text of the Convention by making use of the concept of proportionality to justify violations of the fundamental rights of the population. However, the issue of proportionality only arose in the context of force majeure, which could not be invoked in the present case. The observations of the Committee of Experts and of the Conference Committee were reinforced by those of other organizations. The Human Rights Council had called on Eritrea to engage in far-reaching legal and institutional reform. In June 2017, the Special Rapporteur had been obliged to note that the Government had not made any effort to give effect to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The same applied to the recommendations that the Conference Committee had made to the Government in 2015. Compulsory national service, as currently implemented, was a violation of the fundamental rights of the citizens of Eritrea. It was necessary to give effect to the recommendations made by the Committee in 2015, and to those of the Commission of Inquiry of the United Nations Human Rights Council to repeal the 1995 Proclamation on National Service and to bring an end to the WYDC. The Government was invited to consider ratifying the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, which would usefully supplement the policy of dismantling forced labour that needed to be adopted.

The Employer members recalled that the case essentially involved two national instruments that violated the Convention, namely the Proclamation on National Service No. 82 of 1995 and the 2002 Declaration on the Warsai Yakaalo Development Campaign (WYDC). While conscription into military service was initially limited to 18 months, the war between Eritrea and Ethiopia had led to a lifting of the cap. According to the Government, national service was intended for both military and development purposes. In other words, conscripts could be used in a variety of activities, some of which were purely of a developmental and/or economic nature. However, under the Convention, the use of involuntary labour for non-military work was only permitted in very limited circumstances. When discussing the case in 2015, the Conference Committee had been highly concerned at the continued state of forced labour in Eritrea and urged the Government to seek ILO technical assistance to ensure compliance with the Convention. Following the Committee’s 2015 conclusions, both the IOE and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) had made observations in which they expressed concern at the situation. Noting with regret the Government’s failure to provide a report, the Committee of Experts had strongly urged the Government to take the necessary measures to bring an end to the generalized and systematic practice of the exaction of compulsory labour from the population in the context of the obligation of national service. In 2017, the Committee of Experts had adopted an observation, based on the observations by the IOE and responses thereto provided by the Government. The IOE emphasized the urgency of bringing an end to forced labour in Eritrea, and observed that, despite the commitment to work towards that goal, the Government had not sought ILO technical assistance nor demonstrated any will to cooperate with the ILO. The Government reiterated that demobilization had been interrupted and national service prolonged because of the need to take action vis-à-vis Ethiopia’s state of belligerency. Moreover, the Government was adamant that the work exacted from the population under the WYDC was limited to the benefit of the community, and was not for the profit of private companies or individuals. Consequently, according to the Government, there was no systematic practice of compulsory labour. In its observation, the Committee of Experts noted that, according to the latest reports of the bodies appointed by the United Nations Human Rights Council, the Government had still not taken steps to reform the national service programmes. The Committee of Experts also noted with deep concern that there was no progress by the Government to harmonize its law and practice with the Convention. While it was understandable that the Government wanted to be prepared to defend its borders, it had ratified Convention No. 29, which placed limits on the permissibility of some actions. National legal instruments needed to be harmonized with the provisions of ratified international labour standards. The Government's statement in reply to the observation confirmed that conscription went beyond the limit of 18 months, and military conscripts were used to perform non-military work or activities, including economic activities supposedly for the benefit of the community. However, the interpretation of the facts was controversial. Both the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts had repeatedly found that the situation in Eritrea amounted to forced labour and was in conflict with the Convention, whereas the Government believed that the conscription programme and the non-military activities performed under the WYDC were justifiable as exceptions under Article 2 of the Convention. The Government had also highlighted that it had taken steps to reduce national service by enrolling many conscripts into the civil service, with improved remuneration. While the Government's efforts could demonstrate its intention to follow through on its commitments on demobilization, there were still concerns about those who remained in extended national service, and those who were used in compulsory non-military work. If the Government was committed to complying with its obligations under international law, it needed to take the necessary steps to amend or repeal the national instruments that were in conflict with the Convention. Regardless of their justification, the Proclamation on National Service and the WYDC violated the Convention. In conclusion, the delay in harmonizing national law and practice with the Convention, the number of observations and recommendations by the Conference Committee, the Committee of Experts and other international bodies, and the Government's continued failure to seek assistance from the ILO in that regard justified viewing this case as a serious case of non-compliance.

The Worker member of Eritrea thanked the Committee for giving him the opportunity to intervene and correct certain misconceptions about his country. He expressed concern at the prescriptive approach taken by the Committee of Experts and the IOE concerning the application of the Convention by Eritrea, without having any discernible evidence of the allegations and without considering the reality in Eritrea. Eritrea's genuine approach on grass-roots indigenous development had not been understood. Without visiting the country, it was virtually impossible to understand the Eritrean reality, the spirit of community belongingness and the people's passion for peace, stability, growth and prosperity. Eritrea had its unique vision for the future. The country was indeed still facing socio-economic development challenges and was ravaged by war and geopolitical agendas. However, despite all the hardship, it had managed to retain the most cherished values – honesty, integrity, hard work, community and civic duties, for sustainable nation building. It was hoped that the success achieved in implementing the Millennium Development Goals would be further extended during the realization of the Sustainable Development Goals. Regarding the allegations of forced labour, it was inconceivable that a country that was born from the painful struggle for its self-determination and human rights could allow the violation of the human rights of its people, including the systematic use of forced labour in contravention of the country's values and the principles of the Convention. Eritrea had ratified all the fundamental ILO Conventions, except the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), which was under consideration, and was fully committed to their implementation. The principles of the Conventions were enshrined in the Labour Law, No. 118 of 2001. Eritrean trade unions were active, also in cooperation with international confederations and with the ILO, to protect workers' rights. In order to discuss the Decent Work Agenda and in particular forced labour and labour migration in Africa, an International Solidarity Conference had been organized, in collaboration with the ILO, in Asmara in March 2016, which had been attended by more than 25 national trade unions, the ITUC and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU). Participants at the conference had visited, inter alia, the Bisha Mine. Following the visit, many of the employees of the Bisha Mining Company had been unionized. He added that a formal response had been provided in response to the report of the Commission of Inquiry on human rights in Eritrea, specifying that, in compliance with Article 25 of the Convention, the illegal exaction of forced labour or compulsory labour was punished as a penal offence in Eritrea under the Penal Code, and that section 3(7) of the Labour Proclamation No. 118/2001 provided that the obligation of national service did not constitute forced labour. Eritrea made use of the exceptions under Article 2(2) of the Convention, which included compulsory military service, as well as work which formed part of the normal civic obligations of Eritrean citizens. Eritrean trade unions also regularly ensured compliance with Article 9 of the Convention. While disagreeing with the observations of the Committee of Experts, which equated national service to forced labour, he reiterated his commitment to preventing any such practice should it occur in future. It was to be hoped that the Committee would engage in genuine dialogue with all partners to obtain real information about the situation in Eritrea.

The Employer member of Eritrea stated that it was a procedural violation for the IOE to submit observations on Eritrea to the Committee of Experts without having consulted the Employers Federation of Eritrea (EFE), as a member of the IOE. The allegation therefore had neither legitimacy nor credibility. It was factually baseless. He therefore called on all IOE members to join the EFE in rejecting the unrealistic allegation. The issue of forced labour in the national service programme had been raised in 2015 by the ITUC and then by the IOE in 2017 without substantive information from their respective affiliates. As a matter of fact, the Government was continuously taking measures to mitigate the economic burden of national service members and other employees. At the end of 2015, a new salary scale had been introduced for members of national service, and demobilization was underway. The report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur, on which the Committee of Experts had based its comment, was highly debatable and lacked credibility on many grounds. In general, the allegation was outdated and lacked information on the recent developments regarding the issue under discussion.

The Government member of Bulgaria, speaking on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States, as well as Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Norway, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Montenegro, emphasized that the promotion and universal ratification and implementation of the core labour standards was part of the European Action Plan on Human Rights, adopted in July 2015. Eritrea was a Party to the Cotonou agreement, the framework for cooperation with the European Union which required Parties to respect democracy, the rule of law and human rights principles, including the abolition of forced labour. The Proclamation on National Service and the WYDC of 2002 did not comply with the Convention as they established a generalized and systematic practice of the exaction of compulsory labour from the population.

She noted with deep concern that a large part of the population could be forced into conscription, that work could be required for an indefinite and arbitrary period of time, and that much of this work went far beyond the exceptions authorized by the Convention. She deeply regretted that, despite previous recommendations of the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts, the Government had not taken any measures to amend or repeal the legislation. The threat of war should not be taken as a justification to compel a population to undertake compulsory labour for purposes outside the scope of military service or beyond genuine cases of emergency or force majeure. She urged the Government of Eritrea to tackle this situation and respond positively to the ILO's offer of cooperation and technical assistance and recalled that the EU remained ready to assist Eritrea in meeting its obligations in terms of democratization, human rights and the rule of law, and to support its economic and sustainable development.

The Worker member of Nigeria, also speaking on behalf of the Organisation of Trade Unions of West Africa (OTUWA), recalled that Nigeria had operated a one year national service programme which had been instituted after Nigeria's civil war, while that of Eritrea was linked to its conflict with Ethiopia. However, Nigeria's national service programme did not exact forced labour. Its objective was for youth to appreciate the essence of patriotism as well as to consolidate national unity and to provide them with first-hand work experience. The Government of Eritrea was urged to avail itself of ILO assistance to effectively reform and transform its national service legislation and practices to promote youth social and economic empowerment in accordance with the Committee of Experts' recommendations. Nigeria had a similar experience of a disagreement with a neighbouring State, and the conflict had been resolved amicably with the assistance of the international community. In response to the appeals made by Eritrea, he called for robust technical assistance through the ILO to coordinate an inter-UN agency process for effective follow-up to the peace accord to end the situation of "no war no peace".

The Government member of Sudan thanked the Government of Eritrea for its great interest in workers and labour matters, as well as in the comments of the Committee of Experts. She affirmed that: (a) the Convention provided that national service was not considered as forced labour when a State was confronted with an emergency; (b) the tripartite constituents in Eritrea had taken action through a number of initiatives taken by the Eritrean Workers' Confederation and sought the resolution of the issue with the Government following the observations made by the ITUC; and (c) it was important to welcome and praise the positive developments undertaken by the Government of Eritrea. She suggested that it would be better to stop raising the issues mentioned in the observation of the Committee of Experts altogether and to work jointly with Eritrea to support it in implementing international labour standards.

The Worker member of South Africa echoed the concerns of the Worker members over the indefinite military service for conscripts and the lack of viable socio-economic opportunities for youth. Prolonged national military service was the primary reason for fleeing Eritrea: in 2016 and 2017, Eritrean refugees had constituted the fifth largest group of arrivals in Europe via the Mediterranean Sea. According to the International Organization for Migration, 1,184 Eritreans had arrived by sea in Europe since the beginning of 2018. The United Nations estimated that one tenth of the Eritrean population had fled in recent years. The situation was alarming and the lack of individual and collective economic activities could not be sustained. However, by exploiting conscripts for civil and economic purposes, the Government was contravening international law. Working for up to 15 years, without income, in the context of so-called civic obligations and national duty and under a façade of perpetual military duties could no longer be tolerated. The 2017 report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Eritrea indicated that Eritrea's national service programmes "continued to be arbitrary, extended, and involuntary in nature, amounting to enslavement, as per the findings of the Commission of Inquiry". The new measures to demobilize conscripts and to rehabilitate them in the national civil service, including the introduction of a salary scale was encouraging, but not sufficient. Such efforts needed to be further strengthened and extended and include the adoption of a broader employment and poverty eradication policy in both the public and private sectors. The Government should therefore be urged to accept the ILO's technical assistance to develop a time-bound plan of action.

The Government member of Algeria noted with satisfaction the new measures adopted to organize national service and vocational training within the framework of the country's development programme, in spite of a very difficult situation. He encouraged the Eritrean Government to continue its efforts to meet its obligations under the Convention, in collaboration with the ILO.

The Worker member of Zambia stated that allegations of violations of workers' and human rights as serious as forced labour needed to be based on solid facts and information. A team of 25 international trade unionists had travelled to Eritrea in 2016 and visited the Bisha Mine, in relation to which allegations of forced labour had been made. No incidents of forced labour had been observed. However, in view of the serious allegations, the Conference Committee, the Committee of Experts and other interested parties should undertake a fact-finding mission to Eritrea to: (a) gather first-hand information on the current situation; (b) objectively assess the progress made by the country in the area of human and trade union rights; and (c) identify challenges and propose the way forward for further improvement in these areas. All trade unions and international organizations were urged to continue supporting the National Confederation of Eritrean Workers in capacity building and international trade union solidarity.

The Government representative called for a complete understanding of the issue which could lead to a real solution. It was sad to hear comments that the force majeure in the country was false, when the issue of the national service programme was directly related to the extensive occupation of Eritrean territory by Ethiopia. Peace was a precondition for implementing international labour standards and occupation did not allow for that to happen. In this context, solidarity was essential for development. The fact that national service members had participated in non-military activities was not denied by the Government. However, it had been performed due to the force majeure, not for the purpose of economic development. Eritrea would not have imposed forced labour on its own population; on the contrary, it wanted to abolish forced labour altogether. However, even if legislation was amended, the root cause of the problem would still remain, namely, the occupation of Ethiopia, which needed to be addressed. The discussion based on the unwarranted allegations did not help Eritrea to apply international labour standards. The Government did not reject any technical assistance, provided that it addressed the root causes of forced labour and led to peace and re-stabilization. Considering the seriousness of the circumstances which were not fully understood by others, Eritrea had had to take unilateral action. Furthermore, Eritrea had started and would continue to improve the situation. In this regard, the measures undertaken included the introduction of an adequate salary scale for members of the national service and the rehabilitation of former national service members within the civil service. The WYDC had only been implemented between 2006 and 2015 and had been terminated since then. It was also necessary to clarify that the allegation of the involvement of children under 18 years was not true.

Another Government representative highlighted the procedural issue regarding the submission of the IOE's observations. The fact that the EFE, as a member of the IOE, had not been consulted before the submission of the observations to the Committee of Experts needed to be taken into consideration. He added that, considering the reconstruction and development process of European countries in history, Eritrea should not be treated differently. Due to the continuation of force majeure, there was no alternative to the national service programme. For the same reason, no specific time frame could be established in this regard. In conclusion, he again underlined that Eritrea was willing to engage with the international community and was open to the technical assistance proposed. However, mutual trust was vital and any cooperation should come with a better understanding of the real situation in Eritrea.

The Worker members thanked all speakers and the Government representatives from Eritrea for the information they had provided to the Committee. Although peace, stability and rights were closely linked, it was regrettable that the Eritrean Government had cited in its defence the difficult diplomatic situation with neighbouring Ethiopia to justify its institutional abuses against the Eritrean population and the denial of basic human rights. It was also regrettable that the Government continued to understate and deny the very serious violations in question. It was necessary to put an end to open-ended national service by suspending the WYDC and repealing the Proclamation on National Service. It was also important to end the use of conscripts for work that was not of a strictly military nature. Many reports suggested that conscripts were working for the private sector, which found in them a labour force that was submissive, because they were oppressed and cheap. That must stop. The Government of Eritrea should finally recognize that the situation in the country did not allow it to invoke force majeure to justify the completion of non-military tasks as part of compulsory national service. It should bring an end to the military conscription of children, a practice which was not tenable in the country or acceptable at the international level. The Government should also take urgent measures to protect female conscripts from harassment and sexual violence. The Worker members asked the Government to explain the many allegations of killings, torture, kidnappings and other abuses within the framework of national service. It was critical for Eritrea to change its image as a penitentiary colony. To that end, the Government must shut all secret detention centres, guarantee the safety of detainees, ensure they had access to medical treatment and provide adequate detention conditions, in accordance with international law. It should also put a stop to reprisals against the families of people who had fled the country. An independent mechanism should be established allowing conscripts to file complaints of mistreatment and obtain redress when they had been harmed within the framework of their work obligations. As recommended in 2015, the Government of Eritrea should request the ILO to provide technical assistance with a view to developing an action plan, in consultation with the social partners, to revise military service legislation. It should also put in place a national employment policy and a policy on eradicating poverty.

The Employer members concluded that the key to the issue was that the Government recognized that national service was taking place, but justified it as the force majeure exception under the Convention. In view of its continuing non-compliance with the Convention, including with respect to the use of the force majeure exception, the Government was encouraged to avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO and was urged to cooperate with the

The Government representative raised a point of order and stated that the discussion should be limited to issues raised under Convention No. 29, while some political issues such as those mentioned by the Worker members, did not fall within this scope. He again raised the question of whether the IOE had the right to submit observations without having consulted the EFE. He asked for explanations from the IOE.

The Employer members clarified that the IOE had not made a complaint to this Committee in relation to the case under discussion.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government representatives and the discussion that followed relating to the large-scale and systematic practice of imposing compulsory labour on the population for an indefinite period of time within the framework of programmes related to the obligation of national service. These members of the national service also perform other duties, including a whole range of economic activities. The obligation to perform compulsory national service was stipulated in the Proclamation on National Service of 1995 and the Warsai Yakaalo Development Campaign of 2002.

The Committee noted that the Government has declared that the Warsai Yakaalo Development Campaign is no longer in force, that a number of conscripts have been demobilized and are now under the civil service with an adequate salary. In view of these specific circumstances, the Government has declared that the exceptions to Article 2(2) of Convention No. 29 relating to cases of emergency justify the prolongation of the duration of conscription beyond the statutory 18 months established in the Proclamation on National Service of 1995.

Finally, the Committee noted the Government's statement that it wished to avail itself of technical assistance.

Taking into account the Government's submissions and the discussion that followed, the Committee urged the Government to:

- amend or revoke the Proclamation on National Service to bring to an end forced labour;
- ensure the cessation of the use of conscripts for the execution of forced labour in line with Convention No. 29;
- avail itself without delay of technical assistance in order to fully comply with its obligations under Convention No. 29; and
- report to the Committee of Experts before 1 September 2018 on its progress in implementing the conclusions of this Committee.

The Government representative indicated that procedurally, his country had been treated in a different way than other countries. As it was not known who had sent observations to the Committee of Experts on the application of the Convention in his country, the allegations should have been discarded from the outset. The Conference Committee had not taken into account the real situation on the ground so as to formulate an accurate opinion on the seriousness of the root causes standing in the way of full implementation of the Convention. Consequently, this genuine case of force majeure which was compatible with the Convention was not being acknowledged as such. The Committee was highly dependent on unrelated and unreliable external sources of information and mistrusted the Government's statements concerning, for example, the obsolescence of the WYDC. There was no appreciation of the mitigating measures taken by the Government, such as for example, the progress made in improving the salary scale of the National Service members and integrating them in the civil service. The Government would consider ILO technical assistance provided the assistance led to addressing the root causes of the problem.

His Government believed that human rights were indivisible, interdependent and universal and remained fully committed to them including in the area of labour. Even though his Government was engaged to work jointly with the ILO on all outstanding issues with technical support to mitigate the root causes, he hardly agreed with the conclusions as they were mainly the result of unrealistic information that did not reflect reality.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81)
Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129)

REPUBLIC OF MOLDOVA (ratifications: 1996 and 1997)

A Government representative said that a complex process of reforms was being implemented to bring national legislation, including in the field of labour, into compliance with the instruments referred to in the Association Agreement of 2014 between the European Union (EU) and the Republic of Moldova. During 2016 and 2017, there had been a fundamental reform in the field of state control of entrepreneurial activity, including a reduction from 58 control bodies to 13 authorities and five authorities with regulatory functions. The main purpose of the reform had been to simplify the control procedures, to move to risk-based inspections and to eliminate overlapping competencies among control bodies. As a result of the reform, labour relations had been retained under the competence of the State Labour Inspectorate, while occupational safety and health had been transferred from the State Labour Inspectorate to ten sectoral agencies. The Ministry of Health, Labour and Social Protection was the central body of the public administration responsible for promoting occupational safety and health policy. The State Labour Inspectorate monitored and coordinated compliance, reporting to the central authority the action related to monitoring occupational safety and health carried out by the ten sectoral agencies. Under the reformed institutional framework, employers in all areas of economic activity were monitored in the field of occupational safety and health. In agriculture, this was done by labour inspectors from the National Food Safety Agency. With respect to the allocation of resources, each of the authorities with functions in the field of occupational safety and health were responsible for budgetary planning to ensure the proper implementation of their labour inspectors' activities. The State Labour Inspectorate held training activities for labour inspection, including those with control functions in the field of occupational safety and health, and four inspectors from three agencies had received such training. No interference was permitted in the work of labour inspectors. The Government was in the process of drafting legal acts in order to establish the status of labour inspectors in accordance with ILO Conventions, to be independent of changes of government and of improper external influences. Inspectors in the ten authorities had the right to require and get the support of experts and specialists from other relevant institutions in order to perform occupational safety and health inspections. The State Labour Inspectorate, as a national coordinating body, had the duty to elaborate the labour inspection report, with the participation of the ten competent agencies.

She indicated that labour inspectors with control responsibilities in the field of occupational safety and health had the status of civil servants, except for those who were employees of the National Energy Regulation Agency and the National Regulatory Agency for Electronic Communications and Information Technology. The Government intended to modify the national legislation to include those two agencies. With regard to ensuring a sufficient number of inspectors, 36 personnel out of 43 labour inspectors of the State Labour Inspectorate had been transferred to six newly established authorities with control functions in the field of occupational safety and health, including the budgets for their salaries. There were a sufficient number of inspectors, and inspectors also had competences in the field of activity of the respective agencies. The majority of agencies with occupational safety and health responsibilities had territorial offices. While the Law No. 131 on state control of entrepreneurial activity stated that a planned control could only be carried out in an enterprise no more than once a year, that did not prevent unannounced controls whenever necessary in order to ensure the application of labour legislation and occupational safety and health standards. Law No. 131 had been amended by Law No. 185 of 21 September 2017, to remove the requirement for prior notification of inspections. The number of infringement reports for violations of labour legislation had decreased following the implementation of Law No. 131 in 2013. A six month moratorium on labour inspection had been declared in 2016. Law No. 185 of 2017 amended the Contravention Code to introduce new fines for employers who were not meeting their occupational safety and health obligations under national legislation. Pursuant to Law No. 140 on state labour inspection of 2001 and the Law on safety and health at work, labour inspectors were required to keep confidential the source of any complaint. The modification of the provisions of Law No. 131 removing the requirement for prior notification would ensure that the fact that a control was carried out following a complaint would not be disclosed. The ILO mission undertaken in December 2017 had assisted in focusing on the main issues requiring improvement in the occupational safety and health system. The Ministry of Health, Labour and Social Protection had already undertaken certain administrative and organizational measures in order to implement the mission's recommendations and accelerate the control process in the area of occupational safety and health.

The Employer members recalled that, following a representation made in 2013 by the National Confederation of Trade Unions of Moldova (CNSM), the Governing Body had set up a tripartite committee, the report of which had been published in March 2015, and that the decision to close the representation at that time had been related to the adoption of national measures to give effect, in particular, to Articles 12 and 16 of Convention No. 81. ILO technical assistance, proposed in 2015, had finally been requested by the Government and had been able to begin in February 2017. The national authorities had wished to verify whether their draft reforms of the labour inspection services were in conformity with ILO standards. Despite the efforts made within the framework of the technical assistance, the Committee of Experts, by proposing to include this national situation on the list of cases of serious failure on the occasion of the present session of the Conference, had given a clear indication of non-conformity. The Employer members expressed concern at the issues raised by the Committee of Experts, namely: the existence of a central authority that was still effective and functional to coordinate the various inspection services in the field of occupational safety and health; the reasons for the significant decline in the number of infringement reports referred to the courts between 2012 and 2016; the restrictions on the power of inspectors to carry out inspections without previous notice; guarantees of confidentiality; the need to take measures to ensure that inspections were possible as often as necessary; the real discretion of inspectors to decide whether or not to initiate immediate legal proceedings; and, finally, the issue of the adequate training for labour inspectors in agriculture. Only inspection services which fulfilled the criteria of independence, quality and equality of treatment for all economic actors made it possible to ensure good governance in the world of work and were indispensable for effective administration. In a State which respected the rule of law, through labour inspection and an appropriate regulatory framework, the business climate would stabilize, legal and economic security would increase and the social risks for investors would be more limited. A sound labour inspection service, which acted principally on a preventive and advisory basis, was essential to guarantee fair and ethical competition, which encouraged investment, economic growth and the resulting creation of employment. Although labour inspection services, as required by Conventions Nos 81 and 98, needed to function independently and without restriction in order to ensure the effective enforcement of labour regulation, it was also important for them to be impartial and to operate in accordance with the rule of law. For example, labour inspectors should not be dissuaded from imposing fines and effective measures needed to be adopted to ensure the absence of corruption. The independent and unrestricted functioning of labour inspection services was related to guarantees in terms of good governance, transparency and responsibility.

In view of the increasing complexity of labour legislation in many countries, employers were not always in a position to be able to bring themselves immediately into conformity with the whole corpus of social rules. The inspection services therefore needed to endeavour to provide support to enterprises, on a preventive basis, through the provision of information and technical advice on the most effective means of giving effect to the legislation. In addition to their advisory and preventive functions, the second priority in the action of labour inspection services needed to be to combat social fraud. Sufficient human and material resources should be provided to the inspection services for that purpose, as well as the judicious provision of resources to combat economic and social actors which intentionally failed to respect the rules of the game. Moreover, inspectors needed to have the necessary qualifications, as well as the required independence and ethics, to be able to fulfil their role in an effective and appropriate manner. The Employer members added that the criticisms contained in the observations needed to refer to, and be confined to, the specific rights and obligations set out in the respective Conventions. For example, with reference to paragraph 237 of the General Survey of 2006 of the Committee of Experts, they considered that it did not appear to be appropriate to ensure that a larger number of non-routine inspections were undertaken with a view to ensuring the confidentiality of the identity of the complainants. Similarly, with reference to the issue of immediate legal proceedings, they considered, in light of Article 17(1) of Convention No. 81, that the labour inspection services did not necessarily have absolute discretion to initiate legal proceedings against offenders and that, in light of the national legislation, they should give priority to incentive measures, which were generally very effective. Finally, inspections without prior warning had admittedly demonstrated their effectiveness, but they needed to be surrounded by specific rules and should be carried out in compliance with fundamental freedoms and the principle of proportionality. Nevertheless, the Employer members reaffirmed that the legislative framework in the Republic of Moldova did not yet appear to offer all the necessary guarantees. They therefore encouraged the national authorities to provide the information requested, and to carry out the necessary reforms to make their labour inspection services more effective and in compliance with the principles of the Conventions.

The Worker members, in the same way as the Employer members, recalled that in June 2013 the CNSM had made a representation under article 24 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance by the Republic of Moldova of Convention No. 81. The representation indicated that, following the adoption of Law No. 131, it was no longer possible for the labour inspection services to carry out inspections without prior warning as a notice period of five days was required. The tripartite committee set up to examine the representation had found, in its report approved by the Governing Body in 2015, that Law No. 131 was incompatible with the aforementioned Convention. Since then, the situation had not improved, and indeed had deteriorated. According to the Committee of Experts, although the Government had taken some measures to adapt the national legislation, it still contained provisions that were incompatible with the Conventions. While the Government planned to introduce some exceptions to the obligation to give five days' notice prior to an inspection, the establishment of exceptions was not in itself sufficient to meet the requirements of the Conventions. It should be noted that Law No. 131 withdrew some supervisory competences and functions in the area of occupational safety and health from the state labour inspectorate and transferred them to ten supervisory bodies, including the National Food Safety Agency, the Consumer Protection Agency and the National Centre of Public Health. The division of supervisory functions relating to occupational safety and health diluted labour inspection into a larger framework and led to the eradication of specific features. While the Conventions did not prevent certain responsibilities regarding labour inspection from being assigned to different departments, that was subject to the condition that the competent authority took measures to ensure that adequate budgetary resources were made available and encouraged cooperation between the different departments. It was therefore the responsibility of the Government to provide detailed responses to the observations of the Committee of Experts in that regard. It was particularly important to ensure: the stability of employment and independence of labour inspection personnel; the collaboration of appropriately qualified experts and technicians; a sufficient number of inspectors to allow for the effective fulfilment of inspection duties; the provision of the necessary resources, such as offices and transport; and the conduct of inspections that were as thorough as necessary to ensure the effective application of existing legal provisions. With regard to the number of infringements referred to the courts between 2012 and 2016, which had decreased significantly from 891 to 165, the Government was requested to provide explanations of the decrease and information on the specific results of the reports referred to the courts.

The reason for the confidentiality of the complaints received by the labour inspection services was to protect victims and ensure that they were not subject to reprisals. As the national legislation provided that enterprises had to be informed of inspections five days in advance, non-routine inspections always followed a complaint, which jeopardized the right to confidentiality. With regard to the frequency of inspections, they recalled that article 15 of Law No. 131 provided that each authority exercising supervisory duties must develop an annual inspection plan which could not be modified and which specified the inspections scheduled for each quarter, without it being possible to conduct inspections that were not scheduled. Although the Government claimed that the Law provided for a maximum of one inspection a year unless, according to the risk-based methodology, a greater frequency was required and that there was no limit on non-routine inspections, it had to be noted, in the same way as the Committee of Experts, that non-routine inspections were only authorized under certain specific conditions. They finally referred to article 4 of Law No. 131 (which provided that inspections carried out during the first three years of operation of an enterprise must be advisory) and article 5 (under which, in the case of minor offences, the penalties established by the legislation on administrative and other offences could not be applied). The Worker members considered that such provisions were tantamount to handing enterprises a blank cheque, which allowed them to break the law as they wished, as they were sure that they would not suffer any consequences. It was regrettable that, rather than encouraging the establishment of sound enterprises, which ensured decent jobs in compliance with health and safety standards, the Government preferred in practice to promote means of circumventing laws. It was also clear that such provisions were contrary to the Conventions in question, which provided, subject to certain exceptions, that the violation of legal provisions, which inspectors were responsible for monitoring, gave rise to immediate legal action, without prior notice, and that it was at the discretion of inspectors to assess whether it was necessary to give a warning or advice, or to introduce or recommend prosecution. In conclusion, the Worker members indicated that the legislation on inspection, which had been adopted in 2012, had been strongly influenced by the desire to create an environment conducive to business, which evaded compliance with labour standards. Recalling the purpose of the ILO, they referred to the Preamble of the ILO Constitution, which recalled that “conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled”. There was therefore a link between, on the one hand, poor working conditions – those that were subject to monitoring through inspections – and, on the other, the development of injustice and hardship. The second lesson arising from the Preamble was that poor working conditions prevented any social justice and sustained development for all individuals. That could only be achieved if the right of workers to decent working conditions was respected and monitored through effective inspection. The attainment of those objectives was also conditional on the observance of fundamental labour rights and principles, and first and foremost, freedom of association. Therefore, the dismantling of the labour inspectorate under the pretext of creating a conducive environment for business was a short-term calculation that ran the risk of seriously damaging cohesion and social stability.

The Employer member of the Republic of Moldova indicated that in November 2013 the National Confederation of the Employers of the Republic of Moldova (CNPM) had organized a business forum to examine the main obstacles for the business environment in the country and had made a number of recommendations. The information collected had served as a basis for the development of the business environment improvement programme and a memorandum had been signed with the Government which had served as the basis for reforms. Efforts had been made to eliminate business restrictions. In the field of business regulation, there had been a three-fold reduction in the number of approval documents and the process of financial and statistical reporting had been simplified. An institutional reform had been carried out, optimizing the number of institutions with supervisory powers. The goal of the reform was to reduce the burden on economic agents and significantly reduce the number of controls of enterprises with a view to increasing transparency and predictability in the control process. This included a reduction of institutions with supervisory powers; a reduction in the number of approval documents; a simplification of labour relations through the amendment to the Labour Code; and a simplification of financial reporting. With regard to labour inspections, the CNPM had, in consultation with the social partners and the ILO, found that Law No. 131 was not in compliance with Convention No. 81. Certain amendments had to be made. However, for these governmental initiatives to support the business environment by optimizing the number of institutions, it had been necessary to include the State Labour Inspectorate in the reforms. He referred to a proposal that had been made by the CNPM to create an integrated inspection system comprised of the State Labour Inspectorate and the National Centre of Public Health, as was the case in several other countries, but underlined that the proposal had not been supported. Currently, the Republic of Moldova was going through a number of transformations. In this regard, he eagerly awaited the end of the transitional period in order to assess the outcome of the reforms.

The Worker member of the Republic of Moldova emphasized that compliance with Conventions Nos 81 and 129 contributed to saving lives. Limitations on labour inspection functions were unacceptable. Referring to the representation made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution by the CNSM in 2013 and closed in 2015, he recalled the length of time that it had taken for the representation to be examined. Occupational accidents, including fatal accidents, had occurred after the adoption of Law No. 131 which had been related to the absence of labour inspections. The regulation of occupational safety and health by Law No. 131 was in contradiction with the Conventions. The Ministry of Health, Labour and Social Protection had always supported the position of the CNSM and defended compliance with ILO standards. However, the Ministry had not been supported by the Ministry of the Economy or other parts of the Government. The CNSM had been told that the reform had required change and that, following the signing of the Association Agreement of 2014, the country would have to respect international standards. The tripartite committee set up to examine the article 24 representation had found that Law No. 131 was not in compliance with the provisions of Convention No. 81, and had requested measures be taken to ensure the effective implementation of Articles 12 and 16 of the Convention. While the Government had undertaken to bring the national legislation into line with the provisions of Convention No. 81, through the adoption of the Decent Work Country Programme 2013–16, Articles 12 and 16 of the Convention were not implemented in national legislation. Further, the Ministry of Economy had stated that Law No. 131 was in conformity with international standards and further measures were not needed. The absence of appropriate labour inspection had led to the death of three minors in occupational accidents. Moreover, in April 2016, a moratorium on labour inspection had been introduced. The Committee of Experts had stated that such a limitation was a severe violation of Conventions Nos 81 and 129. Moreover, the functions of the state labour inspection had been transferred to other agencies. He welcomed the fact that, very recently, Parliament had amended the national legislation and given back to the labour inspectorate functions relating to the investigation of severe occupational accidents. An ILO technical assistance mission had led to a number of recommendations on compliance with the Conventions, including with respect to the decentralization of the labour inspection system. Further technical assistance should be provided to improve the national legislation and bring it into compliance with the Conventions.

The Government member of Bulgaria speaking on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States, as well as Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Montenegro and Norway, emphasized the fundamental importance of labour inspection for promoting decent work. She confirmed the commitment to political association and economic integration in the framework of the EU–Moldova Association Agreement with its Deep and Comprehensive Free Trade Area (DCFTA), which was based on core values, notably respect for democratic principles, the rule of law, good governance, human rights and fundamental freedoms, and she welcomed the results of the EU–Moldova Association Council held in May 2018. The issue of labour inspection in the Republic of Moldova had been examined several times by the Committee of Experts, and certain parts of the legislation, particularly Law No. 131, had been found to be in contradiction with Conventions Nos 81 and 129. The reform enacted in 2017, removing occupational safety and health from the mandate of the State Labour Inspectorate, established a complex system that raised many concerns regarding compliance with the Conventions, notably with respect to the overall supervision and coordination of occupational safety and health inspections, the allocation of sufficient budgetary and human resources and the professional qualifications of inspectors, as well as their stability and independence. She expressed concern that the new system would not deliver equal prevention of occupational risks and the protection of health and safety at work to all workers in the country. She also further expressed strong concern at the restrictions on labour inspection contained in Law No. 131, which limited the undertaking of unannounced inspections, as well as the number of inspection visits per year. The Law also weakened the system of penalties and jeopardized the confidentiality of complaints. The number of infringement reports resulting from inspections had also dropped significantly in recent years. The Government was expected to take the necessary steps to bring the national law and practice related to labour inspection, including in agriculture, into conformity with the Conventions, and to avail itself of ILO expertise. The lack of an effective system for the enforcement of labour rights and standards could result in a breach of commitments undertaken by the Republic of Moldova under its Association Agreement (including the DCFTA) with the EU. That included commitments to effectively implement in national law and practice the core labour standards embodied in the ILO fundamental Conventions and to approximate its national legislation to EU law on labour and health and safety at work issues (Article 37 of the Association Agreement). The Republic of Moldova had also undertaken to implement effectively Conventions Nos 81 and 129 in national law and practice pursuant to Article 365 of the Association Agreement. The Republic of Moldova had further committed not to lower levels of protection or to fail to enforce effectively labour law, as an encouragement for trade or investment, pursuant to Article 371 of the Association Agreement. She emphasized the need for the Government, as well as the ILO, to coordinate closely with all relevant international and regional organizations, including the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development to ensure that the measures taken with regard to labour inspection were in accordance with ILO Conventions.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom, emphasized that in accordance with Convention No. 81, the existence of adequately funded labour inspectorates was a vital component in the effective supervision and enforcement of the labour legislation, including occupational safety and health standards. Referring to the discussion on the case of the application of Conventions Nos 81 and 129 by Ukraine, she highlighted that governments were increasingly restricting the powers and resources of labour inspectorates, under the pretext that it would improve the business environment and regularize the informal economy. In the Republic of Moldova, the capacity of labour inspectorates had never been strong and the number of labour inspectors was limited. Recent legislative reform had further undermined the effectiveness of the system. The adoption of Law No. 131 substantially reduced the capacity of labour inspectorates by limiting the frequency of inspections in individual firms, requiring the provision of prior notice and imposing limits on unannounced inspections. These changes had led to a marked increase in workers' complaints of labour violations and accidents in the workplace, by 50 per cent between 2012 and 2013. Ten work-related deaths had been reported in 2013 and there had been a significant increase in serious occupational accidents. The Committee of Experts had concluded that Law No. 131 did not comply with the requirements of Convention No. 81 and had made clear recommendations in that respect, but no amendments had been introduced. Further, in 2016, responsibility for the enforcement of labour law and occupational safety and health had been separated, leading to a fragmentation of occupational safety and health-related enforcement and contributing to the growth in occupational accidents and fatalities. The moratorium imposed in 2016 had also paralyzed the work of the labour inspectorate. Such moratoriums were a clear violation of Convention No. 81. In conclusion, she called on the ILO to provide technical assistance, and for the Government to reform its national legislation to comply with Convention No. 81.

The Worker member of Sweden, speaking on behalf of trade unions from the Nordic countries and Germany, stated that they expected countries engaged in close cooperation with the EU and the European Economic Area to comply with international labour standards. Providing for labour inspection was a requirement of Convention No. 81 that had to be respected by all ratifying member States. Legislation designed to protect decent working conditions had to be applied in practice and labour inspection played a vital role in that respect. The application of Convention No. 81 was therefore both important in itself and an important means of ensuring the correct implementation of other labour standards. The Republic of Moldova and the EU had signed the Association Agreement in June 2014 which contained provisions for the creation of a DCFTA over a ten-year transition period. The DCFTA included a number of commitments relating to both labour standards and environmental matters. A weakened State Labour Inspectorate would not enable the country to comply with its obligations to implement ILO Conventions and those created by the Association Agreement with the EU. The Republic of Moldova risked moving away from its commitment to the enforcement of labour standards at the international and European levels, which had also been confirmed through the institutional mechanisms for the implementation of the trade and sustainable development chapter of the DCFTA. The report of the second joint meeting of the Republic of Moldova – European Union Domestic Advisory Group under the DCFTA had expressed growing concern regarding the situation of the State Labour Inspectorate, which raised problems in view of the ILO's standards on labour inspection as well as under EU law. Labour inspection was under threat in many countries. It was a core function that any responsible state needed to carry out. Weakening labour inspection was harmful to a decent societal climate and detrimental to a fair market for goods and services. Therefore, legislation needed to be introduced to ensure compliance with Convention No. 81 and appropriate resources must be provided for the labour inspectorate to enable it to be effective.

A Government representative recalled that reform in the field of safety and health at work was a challenge, but that, with the support of the ILO and the social partners, the Government would manage to ensure a functional system in line with ILO standards. As the central authority, the Ministry of Health, Labour and Social Protection would update the national occupational safety and health profile with ILO support. A round-table discussion with the participation of high-level officials from relevant institutions would be organized to discuss and share EU best practices. She expressed appreciation for ILO support offered in adjusting the national framework to achieve compliance with ILO standards. With ILO expertise and technical support, it would be possible to improve the national occupational safety and health system. It was important to have an efficient occupational safety and health system in accordance with ILO Conventions, and in this respect, the Government would build an effective labour administration and labour inspection systems through strong tripartite social dialogue. The changes of Law No. 131 did not automatically imply that the budget for inspections would be reduced. The Law did not limit the number of unannounced visits of inspectors as the limitations referred only to planned visits. The penalties for violations had also not been weakened. The reason for the reduced number of infringement reports filed in 2016 was the moratorium put in place that year. While the Government had taken many steps to implement the ILO standards, there were still areas for improvement. She said her Government was ready to continue the constructive engagement with its partners, especially the ILO and the EU, in order to address the issues raised.

The Worker members thanked the Government and encouraged it to act swiftly to bring the legislation into conformity with the Conventions. Certain problems dated back several years and had already been raised by other supervisory mechanisms, including the provisions which prohibited inspections from being carried out without prior notice. In the context of the reform of the inspection services, they called on the Government to ensure: the stability of employment and independence of inspection personnel; the collaboration of experts and duly qualified technicians; a sufficient number of inspectors for the effective exercise of their inspection functions; and the resources necessary for inspectors to perform their duties, including offices and transport facilities. They also called on the Government to ensure that inspectors had the right to conduct inspections as often as necessary and to guarantee the confidentiality of the complaints. The legislation should also be brought into conformity with the Conventions to allow inspectors the discretion to initiate legal proceedings or simply to issue warnings. Finally, they encouraged the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance to give effect to the recommendations.

The Employer members thanked the Government for the information and views provided. They recommended the national authorities to take the necessary measures, and engage in appropriate reforms to bring the labour inspection services into conformity with the principles of Conventions Nos 81 and 129, with particular reference to the authority of inspectors to inspect enterprises without prior warning and the need to carry out inspections as often as necessary. They also called on the Government to provide the Committee of Experts with detailed and precise written responses to all the questions raised in its observation by 1 September 2018. They called on the Government to continue availing itself of ILO technical assistance. They also recalled that, in addition to being provided with the resources necessary to function effectively, the labour inspection services required the necessary legal framework to prevent any abuse. All labour inspection services needed to be independent to ensure their credibility and professionalism. Labour inspection services should engage in open dialogue with the enterprises and persons inspected. Inspections should be legitimate and proportionate to their purpose, and should ensure equality of treatment and respect the need for confidentiality so as not to prejudice the interests of enterprises and persons liable to inspection, and the complainants. They also recalled that the priority of the labour inspection services should be prevention and the provision of advice to companies in good faith, and in particular, that they needed to intensify their efforts to combat social fraud in other enterprises. Fraudulent practices were a scourge for the whole of society, for social security, and also for honest enterprises confronted with grossly unfair economic and social competition.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral statements made by the Government representative and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted that the labour inspectorate must be given the necessary means to function effectively and independently, and it shall also be placed under the supervision and control of a central authority.

Taking into account the Government's submissions and the discussion that followed, the Committee recommends the Government to:

- take the necessary measures and appropriate reforms to bring their labour inspection services into line with the provisions of Conventions Nos 81 and 129;
- bring national legislation and practice into line with Conventions Nos 81 and 129 to enable labour inspectors to carry out visits to workplaces liable to inspection without prior notice in order to guarantee adequate and effective supervision;
- ensure that inspections are proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued and are possible as often as necessary;
- provide to the Committee of Experts in writing before 1 September 2018, detailed and precise information on:
  - the decentralization of labour inspection services since 2012 in the field of occupational safety and health and on the guarantees of effective operation of labour inspectors throughout the national territory;
  - the reasons for the decrease in the number of inspection reports submitted to the courts between 2012 and 2016;
  - the guarantees of confidentiality of the identity of complainants;
  - the measures taken to ensure that labour inspectors can freely initiate or recommend legal proceedings; and
  - the training provided to inspectors in agriculture, including the level of participation.

The Committee invites the Government to continue to avail itself of technical assistance in relation to these recommendations.

UKRAINE (ratifications: 2004 and 2004)

A Government representative stated that the commitment for compliance with the Conventions, ratified in 2004, had been reconfirmed by the Government through the European Union (EU)–Ukraine Association Agreement, as well as the free trade agreement between Ukraine and Canada. The Government had taken all the necessary measures to ensure full compliance with these important ILO Conventions, in both law and practice. The measures taken since the discussion in the Conference Committee in 2017 had included, with respect to legal developments: The cancellation of the moratorium on labour inspection visits through the adoption of: (a) the Law of Ukraine on Temporary Peculiarities of Performing State Supervision (Control) Measures in the Sphere of Economic Activity, dated 3 November 2016, No. 1728-VIII; and (b) Ministerial Decree No. 1104 of 18 December 2017 on the approval of the list of supervisory bodies exempt from the scope of the abovementioned law. These amendments had been made to exclude labour inspection, including occupational safety and health (OSH) and mining supervision, from the moratorium on state control. Concerning the Lugansk and Donetsk regions, a moratorium on labour inspection had been introduced for the period of anti-terrorist operations. The ensuing lack of labour inspections had not only led to a significant increase in wage arrears, but also to the significant deterioration of the social and economic conditions in those areas. The State Level Service (SLS) had established a bill to amend Article 3 of the Law on internal measures for the period of anti-terrorist operations dated 2 September 2014, No. 1669-VII, to exempt labour inspection from the scope of that law. The Government would strongly push for the adoption of those amendments, which were currently before Parliament. The Government had also adopted a new procedure for exercising state supervision of labour legislation, by a resolution which had come into force in May 2017. The Ministry of Social Policy had requested ILO technical comments on the resolution, which had concluded that the draft resolution was not in violation of Conventions Nos 81 and 129. The new labour inspection procedure had established fundamentally new approaches to labour inspection functions. During an inspection, labour inspectors had free and independent access. Concerning the alleged absence of planned control measures, state control was carried out in the form of inspection visits and non-visiting inspections, which by their nature were unscheduled control measures. With reference to policy respecting penalties, employers were given the opportunity to comply with the measures ordered by the labour inspectorate within a certain time limit, except for cases concerning undeclared work and the failure to comply with the payment of wages.

With regard to practical measures, the SLS endeavoured to strike a balance between the promotion of compliance and issuing sanctions. Between January and April 2018, the SLS had conducted more than 3,000 inspections and 137 non-visiting inspections of 3,834 enterprises. During inspections, labour inspectors had detected more than 8,000 cases of non-compliance with labour legislation by almost 2,000 employers. Violations had been detected in 74 per cent of all inspections, with three violations on average per enterprise. The greatest number of violations related to the payment of wages, followed by working hours and rest time. The largest share of violations had been detected in the private sector, mostly in the retail and wholesale services. A total of 2,800 compliance notices had been issued by labour inspectors and almost all of them had been strictly followed by employers. The rights of more than 8,000 workers had been re-established. As a result of inspections, more than 1,000 cases of administrative violations had been referred to court or resolved by the labour inspectorate and had resulted in fines being imposed. More than 200 cases had been referred to the law enforcement agencies and 47 cases had been referred for pre-trial investigation. With regard to preventive activities, labour inspectors had been directly involved in awareness-raising activities and the promotion of labour legislation. In 2018, almost 2,000 events nationwide had been undertaken, including more than 1,000 media events. The SLS had received 160 written requests for advice of complying with legislation and had provided advice to almost 6,000 employers on the most effective ways to comply with labour legislation. In the framework of the ILO technical assistance provided at the request of the Government, the SLS had been one of the main beneficiaries. In this context, reference should be made to the ILO project to strengthen the effectiveness of the labour inspection system and social dialogue mechanisms, including the development and implementation of a gender-responsive policy and measures for the recruitment and retention of labour inspectors. Moreover, the Government was working with the ILO to extend the work of the SLS to the informal economy and to establish a functioning model of tripartite dialogue within the labour administration. Starting in November 2017, the ILO–EU project “Enhancing labour administration capacity to improve working conditions and tackle undeclared work” had included measures to implement the obligations of Conventions Nos 81 and 129, selected EU Directives, and training on these Conventions and EU Directives. A variety of safety and health standards were also being reviewed with a view to the ratification of the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187). The Government was committed to making efforts to ensure the adaptation of the legislation, the improvement of management mechanisms, the development of better business conditions and safer working conditions.

The Employer members welcomed the Government’s detailed statement and comprehensive information on the measures taken to address the situation, including those on capacity building and the training of inspectors as well as on awareness-raising campaigns. The Government was invited to provide that information to the Committee of Experts so that it could be analysed at its next session. Since 2010, the Committee of Experts had made six observations on the application by Ukraine of the Conventions. The case had been discussed by the Conference Committee in 2017 as a double-footnoted case. In 2017, the Conference Committee had noted positively the progress achieved in 2016. It had also noted that the ILO had undertaken a needs assessment of the labour inspection system in response to a request by the Government, and a number of recommendations had been made, as well as the ILO project on the strengthening of the effectiveness of the labour inspection system and social dialogue mechanisms launched from September 2016. They had noted with interest that new legislation had entered into force in May 2017, which had had an impact on state supervision and labour inspection. They also welcomed the information provided on what might trigger inspections, and the organization and feedback on engagement with the ILO, and particularly the training of labour inspectors. The Government was encouraged to continue accepting technical assistance to ensure that new and any existing legislation reflected the provisions of Convention No. 81, in particular the requirement for labour inspectors to be public officials, independent of changes of Government and any external influences. They had finally noted that the moratorium had expired and had not been extended. In its conclusions, the Conference Committee had called upon the Government to: (a) provide detailed information on recent legislation enacted regulating the labour inspection system; (b) promote effective dialogue with employers’ and workers’ organizations concerning labour inspection matters; (c) continue to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in order to strengthen the capacity and resources of the labour inspection system, in particular with regard to the training and capacity building of labour inspectors; (d) ensure that the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors guaranteed their independence and impartiality in line with the Conventions; and (e) ensure that other functions entrusted to labour inspectors did not interfere with their primary duties and impact negatively on the quality of labour inspections.

The Employer members emphasized at the outset the importance of compliance by member States with the two ILO Conventions on labour inspection. In this regard, they urged the Government to: (a) ensure that recent legislative amendments brought the national legislation into conformity with the Conventions; and (b) ensure that inspections were carried out as often as necessary and were not hampered by a strict regulatory timetable, while recalling that the means used should be proportionate to the legitimate aims pursued (under Article 16 of Convention No. 81 and Article 21 of Convention No. 129). Taking into account new legislation enacted in 2017 and the 2018 amendments, they encouraged the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken to ensure that the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors guaranteed their independence and impartiality in line with the Conventions; and provide information to the Committee of Experts on how authorized officials working as labour inspectors under the SLS and local authorities were independent from any undue influence, as well as information related to the training received. In this regard, it was important to guarantee the impartiality of inspectors and that their activities were carried out according to law. Therefore, measures to guarantee impartiality should be accompanied by measures to ensure good governance, transparency and accountability of inspectors for their actions. The Government was also encouraged to take measures to ensure that the number of inspectors and the level of resources were appropriate for the effective performance of their duties, as well as measures to strengthen labour inspection in the informal economy. They finally encouraged the Government to continue to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in relation to the ongoing action to strengthen the effectiveness of the labour inspection system and looked forward to receiving information on the results of the ongoing cooperation.

The Worker members recalled that, during the discussion of the case in 2017 as a double-footnoted case, the Committee had invited the Government to ensure that the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors enabled them to be independent and impartial, and that the other tasks assigned to them did not prevent them from carrying out their primary duties, or have a negative impact on the quality of inspections. According to the latest comments by the Committee of Experts, even though the Government had refrained from adopting a new moratorium on labour inspection, the situation had not improved. Several legal and regulatory mechanisms adopted in 2017 limited the work of the labour inspectorate and were contrary to the Conventions, such as: the restrictions on the right of inspectors to conduct inspections without prior notice; the limitations on the frequency of inspections and the power of labour inspectors to initiate legal proceedings without advance warning; and the bill submitted to Parliament, which made it an administrative offence to carry out an inspection without prior notice. Such provisions had been adopted despite the fact that the Conventions gave inspectors the right to conduct inspections without prior notice and as often as necessary. The Government should therefore ensure that the restrictions were not implemented. It should also bring its legislation into conformity with the relevant provisions of the Conventions.

Furthermore, and in the light of the Conventions, the argument that advisory tasks should take precedence over inspections was untenable. The two types of tasks were complementary, and inspectors must have the freedom to carry out one or the other, depending on the situation. The requirement for the inspection system to be placed under the direct and exclusive control of a central authority, which was established in the Conventions, made it possible to ensure the independence of the labour inspectorate from the local authorities, and to facilitate the establishment and application of a uniform policy throughout the territory. Nevertheless, the existence of a central authority did not mean that there was no need to ensure the physical presence of inspection services at the regional and local levels. Such a regional presence was important as it allowed the legislation to be applied in the same way throughout the country and all employers and workers to be placed on an equal footing. It was also vital to ensure the allocation of sufficient budgetary resources to different departments when assigning certain responsibilities to them. The competent authority must also ensure that organizational changes were made in accordance with the provisions of the Conventions. The Worker members recalled the importance of ensuring that inspectors were free from all external influence, and that they had the qualifications and training needed to perform their duties. They asked the Government to provide the information requested by the Committee of Experts on that subject. It was also fundamental to allocate the material and human resources required for inspection, so that inspectors could adequately monitor workplaces. It should be ensured that inspectors were sufficient in number and had adequate resources to perform their tasks efficiently. As emphasized by the Committee of Experts, the issue of material and human resources remained problematic, and the objectives of the Conventions had not been achieved. Ukraine only had 542 inspectors and 223 posts were vacant. The Government should provide the information requested by the Committee of Experts on the subject and take the necessary steps to comply with the Conventions.

The Worker member of Ukraine stated that labour inspection was still being restricted by Act No. 877 of 1 January 2017 concerning the fundamental principles of state supervision and monitoring of economic activity, which was in contradiction of the Conventions. In July 2017, the Parliament had approved at its first reading the Bill on amending certain legislative acts of Ukraine regarding the prevention of unreasonable pressure on businesses by measures of State supervision and monitoring on compliance with labour and employment legislation (Bill No. 6489). The Bill was not aimed at improving State control of labour and employment legislation, as its name might suggest. While the authors of the Bill pretended that there was a need to move from punitive inspection to the prevention and rectification of offences, as well as to address undeclared work and abuses by labour inspectors during inspections, the Bill was in fact trying to restrict State labour control and provide businesses with a possibility to avoid penalties for first violations. The proposed legislative changes were an invitation for businesses to employ undeclared workers without having to fear any consequences. As the employment of undeclared workers was always an intentional offence, there should be no warnings, but dissuasive fines. In other countries, employers which did not hire legal workers were criminally liable, whereas the Bill even proposed to suppress administrative liability. The Bill also introduced administrative responsibility for individuals and officials who made groundless complaints to the State supervision and monitoring authorities about labour law violations. Those proposed changes directly contradicted Convention No. 81, under which national legislation should prohibit the disclosure by labour inspectors of the sources of complaints. Fines for such complaints in the Bill ranged from 50–100 times the minimum wage to 150–300 times the minimum wage, in the event of repeated offences. As the minimum wage in the country was equivalent to €122, workers in the informal sector would simply be afraid to make a complaint to the labour inspectorate in order to not lose their jobs. Currently, almost 4.5 million workers were working illegally, without the formalization of their employment relationship, and more than 100,000 workers had received their wages late.

At the end of 2017, the Cabinet of Ministers had prepared and sent to the Supreme Council a Bill on amending certain legislative acts of Ukraine concerning the establishment of proper safe and healthy working conditions (Bill No. 8045), which provided for State supervision of the legislation on labour protection and hygiene, and State mining supervision. The Bill complied with the requirements of the labour inspection Conventions, as it was proposed to lift the moratorium on labour inspection. A sharp increase in the number of deaths and injuries had occurred between 2017 and 2018 as a result of the moratorium. The Bill also envisaged regulations of on State supervision being issued by the Cabinet of Ministers. In May 2018, the specialized committee of the Supreme Council had recommended to Parliament the adoption of the Bill. He expressed the hope that the Bill would be adopted in the near future. However, attention should also be drawn to the fact that in 2017 the Government had illegally abolished the existing acts on labour protection, which had led to the deterioration of social protection, working conditions and the safety of workers. This was in violation of article 18 of the Act on Labour Protection (Safety and Health) of 14 October 1992, establishing the procedure for the development, adoption and abolition of regulations on labour protection, as the trade unions had not been consulted. The abolition of the laws regulating standards for the issuance of uniforms, special footwear and other personal protective equipment had been made without substituting them with more modern standards. The objective of reducing pressure on business was not justified, in view of the consequences for the health and safety of workers. He expressed the hope that the controversial Bill No. 6489, which was in violation of ILO standards would be withdrawn, and that the regulation of the labour inspectorate would be based on the provisions of Convention No. 81, and not on the interests of a separate group of persons promoting such bills. He pointed out the need to continue and intensify technical assistance to strengthen the capacity of labour inspection, in close cooperation with the social partners.

The Employer member of Cambodia, conveying the position of the Joint Representative Body of Employers at the National Level of Ukraine, referred to Act No. 1774 of 2016 amending Article 34 of the Local Self-Government Act, and the procedure for monitoring compliance with labour legislation, approved in connection with that Act. That legislation had empowered the local authorities to monitor compliance with labour and employment legislation within their territorial jurisdiction, conduct inspections and impose penalties for labour violations and had enabled officials working at the local authority to act as labour inspectors. That was not in conformity with the Conventions, in accordance with which labour inspectors had to be public servants and labour inspections were to be conducted under the supervision and control of a central authority; appropriately qualified technical experts and specialists should be involved in inspections and labour inspectors should receive continued training. In reality, the activities of the local self-government officials endowed with the powers of labour inspectors did not meet the requirements of the Conventions. Local self-government officials were neither controlled by, nor accountable to, the SLS. Moreover, there were often conflicts and confrontation in determining the limits on the powers of the local and central inspectors. Local self-government officials did not undergo the relevant qualification selection and were not under the coordination and methodological support of the SLS. Nor were local self-government officials independent. It was therefore impossible to appeal against the actions of local self-government officials or to hold them responsible for misconduct. Furthermore, there was a duplication of the powers of SLS regional branches and local authorities, resulting in double inspections by two different bodies, creating a burden for employers. In conclusion, she emphasized the need to repeal the above legislation which was in contradiction of the provisions of the Conventions and unreasonably extended the discretionary powers of labour inspectors, defined by these Conventions, to officials of local self-government incapable of effectively performing such functions. This problem could be resolved by adopting Bill No. 6489, which would deprive the local self-government of control functions and the power to impose penalties.

The Government member of Bulgaria, speaking on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States, as well as Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Montenegro and Norway, reiterated that effective labour inspection was fundamental to human rights, safe workplaces and decent work. She recalled the political association and economic integration in the framework of the EU-Ukraine Association Agreement and its Deep and Comprehensive Free Trade Area (DCFTA). Ukraine had ratified and committed to implement effectively, in law and practice, the ILO governance Conventions on labour inspection. It was regrettable that, although the Committee had discussed this case last year, the issues remained unresolved. Since 2014, the Government had undertaken reforms to strengthen labour inspection services and the SLS, with technical assistance from the ILO and support from the EU. She welcomed the Government's exemption of the SLS from the general moratorium on inspections for 2018, and strongly encouraged making this exemption permanent. Furthermore, the preparation of new legislation that would permanently abolish the moratorium on labour inspections, was an important precondition for full compliance with ILO Conventions and the EU-Ukraine Association Agreement, which would send a positive signal to workers and employers regarding the Government's intention to safeguard working standards. However, certain legislative measures were of great concern, namely Act No. 877 of 1 January 2017 concerning the fundamental principles of state supervision and the monitoring of economic activity and Ministerial Decree No. 295 of 26 April 2017 on the procedure for State control and State supervision of compliance with labour legislation, which drastically restricted labour inspectors' ability to undertake inspections without prior notice, the frequency of inspections and their discretion to initiate prompt legal proceedings without prior notification. Bill No. 6489 would make unscheduled inspections an administrative offence. The Government was called upon to promptly amend Act No. 877 and Ministerial Decree No. 295 to ensure conformity with the Conventions, and to ensure in practice that no restrictions were imposed on the powers of labour inspectors, including limits on unscheduled inspections. Regarding decentralization of the labour inspection system, the Government must ensure close supervision and coordination by the central authority, the allocation of adequate budgetary resources to authorities performing inspections and the provision of sufficient training to inspectors; it must also provide information on how the new system guaranteed the independence of authorized officials working as inspectors. The Government was encouraged to thoroughly assess the new system and to commit to amending it as appropriate, with ILO technical assistance. Given the 223 vacant labour inspection positions, more information was needed on Government measures to improve the budgetary situation of the SLS, and the material and human resources of the labour inspection services. In light of the highly politicized debate on the adoption of the new Labour Code, the Government was strongly encouraged to take due regard of ILO comments, particularly concerning working conditions, OSH and mining. While remaining committed to constructive engagement and partnership with the Government, she expected it to avail itself of ILO expertise in taking the necessary steps to bring the national labour inspection legislation and practice into conformity with the Conventions.

The Worker member of Sweden, speaking on behalf of the trade unions of the Nordic countries and the United Kingdom, indicated that countries cooperating closely with the EU were expected to comply with international labour standards, including in times of hardship. As many ILO standards concerned occupational safety and health and working conditions, efficient labour inspection was of twofold interest, both in ensuring compliance with the Conventions, and in securing the proper enforcement of other ILO standards. Since the review of this double-footnoted case the previous year, the EU and Ukraine had launched a project within the framework of the EU–Ukraine Association Agreement that was intended to support reforms in such areas as employment policy, labour market and social protection by enhancing the labour administration capacity to improve working conditions and tackle undeclared work. Through this valuable project, lawmakers and the social partners were working closely to align Ukrainian OSH and labour legislation with EU Directives and ILO Conventions, and to strengthen the capacity of the Ministry of Social Policy and the SLS to implement its labour inspection mandate, with a particular focus on undeclared work. It nonetheless remained important for the ILO to continue to provide technical support and to promote the active participation of the social partners. Just one month after the discussion of the case the previous year, Parliament had approved Bill No. 6489, which would eliminate penalties for first violations of labour legislation regarding undeclared work, introduce administrative penalties for unjustified unscheduled inspections, and would limit the access of labour inspectors to workplaces and the sanctions they could apply. She hoped that those provisions would be corrected. Labour inspection was not a mere formality, but an efficient means of ensuring compliance with applicable standards, fair competition, and a safe and healthy work environment. Therefore, the Government was expected to bring national legislation and practice into conformity with Convention No. 81.

The Government member of the United States indicated that the discussion of the case in 2017 had highlighted a number of legal constraints that had inhibited the carrying out of labour inspections. While there had been reports that the SLS had conducted some complaint-based labour inspections, including some without prior notice, according to other reports, the labour inspectorate was still unable to conduct inspections of its own initiative. The Committee of Experts had pointed to the significant legal restrictions on the activities of the labour inspection services (limitations on the free initiative of labour inspectors to undertake inspections without prior notice, on the frequency of labour inspections). Moreover, the legislative amendments enacted in 2014 required the SLS to seek approval from the Cabinet of Ministers to conduct inspections of businesses with an annual income of less than US$750,000 (which corresponded to 80 per cent of businesses). If enacted, Bill No. 6489 would make the conduct of unscheduled inspections visits an administrative offence. Those legal restrictions severely inhibited the capacity of the labour inspectorate to perform its key functions in the way that was required by the Conventions to most effectively protect workers. The Committee had already called upon the Government to adopt a number of measures to strengthen the capacity of the labour inspectorate; undertake legal reforms to ensure compliance with the Conventions; and, more importantly, ensure that the labour inspectorate was in a position to carry out the critical government function of labour law enforcement. He considered that to implement these recommendations, the Government should be urged to take the necessary measures to ensure that provisions creating legal obstacles to labour inspection were brought into conformity with the Conventions; avail itself of ILO technical assistance to ensure that the competent legislative and administrative authorities understood the obligations under the Conventions; and provide sufficient budgetary and other resources to the labour inspectorate, including by filling outstanding vacancies.

The Worker member of the United States welcomed the fact that Ukraine was not pursuing a nationwide moratorium on labour inspections. Nonetheless, he expressed concern about what seemed to be a regional trend towards weakening labour inspectorates. He also questioned the slow and excessively complex process of reforming the labour inspectorate, which indicated a reluctance to affirm the role of the State to perform labour inspection. One of the main remaining issues was that unannounced inspections were still prohibited, in spite of the fact that the Conventions provided for the right of labour inspectors to enter freely and without previous notice at any hour of the day or night any workplace subject to inspection. While it was positive that some inspections had been carried out as of February 2018, the requirement of advance permission greatly limited the effectiveness of the labour inspection system. Another issue of concern was Bill No. 6489. While the adoption of the Bill was still pending, it provided for the imposition of penalties for complaints which had been found not to have merit, thereby contradicting the spirit of Convention No. 81. Another matter of concern was that the inspectorate lacked adequate resources and technical capacity. Local unions reported that labour inspectors usually had no capacity to investigate cases of workplace injuries or wage arrears. For those reasons, the labour inspectorate needed to be fully empowered, with a mandate, budget, the capacity and confidence in its stature. A moratorium on inspections continued in the country's conflict zones; those regions were heavily industrialized and the continued moratorium covered a number of particularly dangerous sectors, including the coal, metal and mining sectors, in which hundreds of thousands of workers were employed. The draft legislation to repeal the moratorium had not been approved by Parliament. Ukraine's economy remained very fragile, and could not afford the adverse impact of shortcuts based on poor safety standards. In order to recover from conflict and from the moratorium on inspections, Ukraine should rebuild its institutions responsible for the vital function of labour inspection and professionalize labour inspectors. Those measures were especially important in high-risk sectors, such as mining, that were central to Ukraine's economic life.

The Government member of Switzerland supported the statement made on behalf of the European Union and emphasized that the effective functioning of the labour inspection services was essential for labour conditions and workers' rights to be respected. Such effectiveness also contributed to economic development, including fair competition between companies. Ukrainian legislation put several restrictions on the authority of labour inspectors, including on the frequency of inspections and the right to carry out inspections without notice. In addition, more than 223 inspector positions remained unfilled. It was regrettable that the Committee had to discuss the case again. The Government should therefore: ensure the implementation of legislation in accordance with the obligations established in the Conventions; make sure that national labour inspection services had the necessary human and financial resources to carry out their activities without restriction or interference; modernize inspection procedures and harmonize them with international standards. He emphasized that inspection procedures should be reviewed in consultation and cooperation with the social partners and the private sector.

An observer representing IndustriALL Global Union stated that the moratorium on labour inspection particularly affected workers in mines, where the rate of fatal accidents made them the country's most dangerous work sector. The 2017 report of the Ukrainian Fund of Social Insurance showed that, as a result of the moratorium on labour inspection, the number of industrial accidents at production sites had substantially increased since 2016. The moratorium on inspections had seriously undermined and dismantled State labour inspection; the total number of inspectors had decreased and many competent specialists had gone. Even after the removal of the ban on labour safety inspections, time would be needed to restore the service to full strength. The problem of lack of staff, and especially of qualified staff, required urgent attention. He referred to recent examples, including in a steel plant, where 90 per cent of the rolling stock was worn out, and an investigation by the State Safety Inspectorate had found 83 violations, including locomotives without functioning brakes. In April 2018, the lives of 240 mining workers had been endangered when they had been trapped 1,000 metres underground for several hours after the local electricity provider had cut the power supply in a mine. Twice in April, electricity had also been cut in 16 different coalmines. The problem of OSH, which was a result of the moratorium on labour inspection, was aggravated by other work-related issues, such as low wages and arrears in the payment of wages. In April 2018, 12,000 members of an industrial affiliate, the Nuclear Power and Industry Workers' Union of Ukraine, held actions in eight different cities to protest against a State policy of low-energy tariffs, which resulted in low pay for workers. Current wage arrears had amounted to 2.4 billion hryvnias (equal to US$92 million), of which one third concerned coalminers. Certain estimates had found that arrears in the formal economy, when combined with the shadow economy, could easily be double or even triple that amount. The Government needed to urgently address the situation of safety at work, as well as arrears in wages and low wages, a matter made more urgent by its past failure to implement the Committee's recommendations and observations. Workers expected and demanded appropriate responses from the Government.

The Government representative emphasized that significant progress had been made in resolving the issues regarding labour inspection discussed at the Conference Committee in 2017. Except for the conflict areas of the country, in the rest of the territory, labour inspectors had free access to workplaces and could conduct inspections at any hour of the day or night without previous notice. This was guaranteed by Ministerial Decree No. 295 on certain questions of the implementation of article 259 of the Labour Code and article 34 of the Law on local government of 26 April 2017, as well as legislative changes which had come into effect in 2017. The labour inspection functions carried out by the local authorities were limited to the control of compliance with legal provisions respecting wages. The SLS exercised control in that it had access to the record of the inspection visits carried out by the local authorities (including the workplaces concerned, the actions taken and the penalties imposed). The SLS could not only step in, but had also set up an appeal procedure for enterprises against the actions taken by the local authorities. He emphasized that Bill No. 6489 had been introduced in accordance with the legislative procedure and that other bills existed, including Bill No. 8045 which proposed to lift the moratorium on labour inspection and Bill No. 8101 which proposed to remove the restrictions for labour inspection in the Donetsk and Lugansk regions. These Bills would hopefully soon be considered by Parliament. The late payment of wages in Ukraine was a priority issue for the SLS, and both national labour inspectors and inspectors working in the local authorities were doing all in their power to address that situation. The Government was also currently studying the issue of how to increase the resources for labour inspection, so that labour inspectors could focus on the priority areas of unregistered labour, wage arrears and the failure to pay minimum wages. With regard to the issue of fines, labour inspectors were indeed empowered to issue fines, up to an amount of more than 10,000 hryvnia (approximately US$382) with regard to undeclared work. In the current difficult times (including the military conflict and efforts to promote the economic development of the country), the Government was trying to strike a balance between preventive measures and the imposition of penalties, intending to be judicious in applying fines. Replies to all requests for information on the measures taken to fully implement the Conventions would be sent for examination by the Committee of Experts.

The Worker members thanked the Government representative for the explanations provided and recalled that the Government had already made a series of commitments during the previous discussion. Not only had those commitments not been honoured, but a series of new violations had been noted. Consequently, the Government was requested to lift all the restrictions imposed on the labour inspectorate, particularly the restriction on conducting an inspection without prior warning and the limits placed on its discretionary power to commence legal proceedings. The provisions that made the conduct of unannounced inspections an administrative offence must also be amended, as they were incompatible with the Conventions. The Government should also provide information regarding the organization of the inspection services and provide for all the necessary guarantees to ensure the independence of inspectors and their ability to fulfil their duties. The Government should also provide sufficient material resources to the labour inspectorate and ensure their good working conditions, remuneration, transport costs and the provision of offices and office supplies. It was also crucial to take the necessary steps to fill the vacant positions. They invited the Government to continue to accept ILO technical assistance to facilitate the implementation of the Committee's recommendations, in close collaboration with the social partners.

The Employer members welcomed the Government's and responses to a number of issues, as well as the information on the priorities of the SLS, in particular with regard to the implementation of the two Conventions. Notwithstanding the challenges resulting from the military conflict in certain regions, the Government had taken positive measures to bring the law and practice into conformity with the Conventions. The Government was encouraged to allocate adequate resources for labour inspection and to continue capacity-building activities for labour inspectors. However, there was concern over local government officials and their potential capacity to fill the role of labour inspectors. As already mentioned, measures needed to be taken to ensure the independency, transparency and accountability of inspectors for their actions. They urged the Government to provide information to the Committee of Experts on the recent legislation enacted and on the issues raised, in order to fully measure progress in that regard. Effective dialogue was a very important component of that process. The Government also needed to guarantee the independence of labour inspectors in line with the provisions of the Convention and to ensure that other functions did not interfere with their primary duties or impact negatively on the functions performed. They finally urged the Government to continue to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in order to further strengthen the resources allocated to labour inspection, with specific emphasis on training and capacity building of inspectors.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral statements made by the Government representative and the discussion that followed.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

Algeria (ratification: 1962)

The Committee noted that the labour inspectorate must be given the necessary means to function effectively and independently, and it shall also be placed under the supervision and control of a central authority.

Taking into account the Government's submissions and the discussion that followed, the Committee recommends the Government to:

- take the necessary measures and appropriate reforms to bring their labour inspection services into line with the provisions of Conventions Nos 81 and 129;
- provide detailed information regarding the restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors contained in Act No. 877 and Ministerial Decree No. 295 and regarding the recent legislation enacted on the labour inspection system;
- promote effective dialogue with employers' and workers' organizations concerning labour inspection matters;
- ensure that the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors guarantee their independence, transparency, impartiality and accountability in line with the Conventions;
- ensure that the inspection functions of the local authorities are placed under the supervision and control of the State Labour Service; and
- ensure that other functions entrusted to labour inspectors do not interfere with their primary duties and impact negatively on the quality of labour inspections.

The Committee encourages the Government to continue to avail itself of technical assistance in order to strengthen the capacity and resources of the labour inspection system, in particular with regard to the training and capacity building of labour inspectors. The Committee requested that the Government report in detail on the measures taken to implement these recommendations to the next meeting of the Committee of Experts in November 2018.

ALGERIA (ratification: 1962)

The Government has provided the following written information.

Requests for the reinstatement of dismissed workers

The national legislation provides for procedures for the prevention and settlement of individual labour disputes. Act No. 90-04 of 6 February 1990, as amended and supplemented, respecting the settlement of individual labour disputes, establishes procedures for the settlement of individual labour disputes that have to be complied with by each worker and each employer.

In this regard, in the cases of the workers referred to in the conclusions of the 106th Session of the International Labour Conference (ILC), the procedures set out in the above Act were followed, irrespective of the outcome of the settlement of their individual labour dispute.

In this context, it is necessary to recall that the Government has always responded to the requests made by the competent ILO bodies. In this respect, and following verification, it has been found that of the 86 workers, the situations of 76 workers have been settled or are in the course of being settled. The cases are before the competent jurisdictions in six cases and orders are in the course of being given effect in three cases.

With reference to the situation of eight of the remaining ten workers, two have been dismissed, following the completion of all the procedures set out in the laws and regulations, on the grounds of unjustified absence and failure to comply with the internal enterprise rules, and three workers have been dismissed for serious professional misconduct.

In this regard, the Government observes that examination of the files of the workers shows that on no occasion was it found that it was a penalty on grounds of the exercise of trade union activities, but on the grounds of types of professional misconduct envisaged by the law and the internal enterprise rules. The workers concerned availed themselves of all of the means of recourse envisaged by the law for the settlement of individual labour disputes, including reconciliation through the labour inspection services of the competent jurisdictions. Accordingly, almost all of the workers referred to by name in the conclusions of the 106th Session are in work, with the exception of Mr Habib Benyahia (SNAPAP-CGATA) of the University of Tiaret, who has taken retirement. Moreover, it has also been found that, among these workers, Mr Haddak Arab (SNAPAP-CGATA) has been promoted to the level of administrative officer.

The clerks of court are in employment. The Government attaches all the documents provided by the employer concerning the situation of all the workers referred to in the conclusions.

Case No. 3210 before the Committee on Freedom of Association

The Government had provided full information on the complaint before the Committee on Freedom of Association made by the Autonomous National Union of Electricity and Gas Workers (SNATEGS) (Case No. 3210) in a communication dated 18 December 2017, in which it informed the ILO of the voluntary dissolution of SNATEGS (copy attached) and the record of the voluntary dissolution of the union. In a communication dated 5 May 2018, in relation to Case No. 3210, the Government called for the case to be closed.

Completion of the reform of the Labour Code

With regard to the request concerning the completion of the reform of the Labour Code, the Government provided full information on the process of the drawing up of the Labour Code and will spare no effort in the context of the dialogue organized with its economic and social partners for the development of a consensual Labour Code which will reinforce the lessons learnt from the experience of the implementation of the labour legislation that is in force and will respond to the expectations of the economic actors.

Registration of unions

With regard to the case of the registration of the presumed Autonomous Algerian Union of Transport Workers (SAATT), the documents submitted did not correspond to the conditions set out in the provisions of the Act, and particularly section 2. There was a lack of precision in the determination of the occupational category covered by the by-laws, which did not contain the provisions that have to be included in the by-laws as set out in section 21 of the Act. The persons concerned did not reply or ask for further details on their file.

With regard to the documentation for the Autonomous Union of Attorneys in Algeria (SAAVA), the Government recalls that any request for the establishment of a union is subject to examination of the conformity of its documentation with the law. In this regard, it was found from the examination of the by-laws of the presumed union that there were categories of persons who were salaried employees or employers. The national legislation makes a distinction between a union of salaried employees and an employers' organization. The response was communicated to the persons concerned with an invitation to comply with the provisions of the legislation, but up to now those concerned have not brought their documentation into conformity with the provisions of the law.

With reference to the documentation of the CGATA, in addition to the information already provided by the Government representative at the 106th Session of the ILC in June 2017, the alleged President of the CGATA was not a member of any legally registered trade union and does not represent any trade union. The Government also informed the ILO through a communication of 22 September 2013, of which a copy is attached, that Mr Rachid Malaoui was dismissed from his job in accordance with the procedures set out in the law and regulations for abandoning his job through unapproved absences. This situation resulted in him losing his position as an employee.

In Algeria, representative unions benefit from prerogatives which enable them, among other functions, to negotiate and conclude accords and collective agreements, to have premises in the employer enterprise, a notice board in appropriate places for their members and leave for trade union purposes in the service of their organization during the period of office of the trade union member. The participation of workers' representatives, through trade union delegates, is a legal requirement for the negotiation of terms and conditions of employment and of work with a view to the conclusion of collective labour accords and agreements. Workers' representatives in enterprise committees or units are designated by the most representative trade union or, failing that, by the representative committee. Where there is no union or representative committee, they are elected by the workers collectively. It is a requirement for workers' representatives to be associated with any decision concerning the establishment of occupational medical services by the employer. Similarly, representative organizations of workers and employers are represented by twelve (12) workers' representatives and twelve (12) employers' representatives on the national occupational safety and health and medicine board.

Moreover, in the context of the prevention and settlement of collective labour disputes and the exercise of the right to strike, workers' representatives hold regular meetings with employers with a view to undertaking a joint examination of the situation with regard to the socio-occupational relations and general conditions of work of the employer. At the national level, Algeria has acquired great experience of social dialogue through tripartite meetings bringing together the Government and representative organizations of employers and workers. These dialogue and negotiation forums have resulted in agreements on economic and social life, the conclusion of economic and social pacts and the creation of institutions and other bodies. A summary of tripartite and bipartite meetings is attached.

In addition, before the Committee, a Government representative expressed astonishment that Algeria had once again been included among the cases to be examined by the Conference Committee and regretted the recurrent refusal to recognize the progress made in the country in the protection of human rights and freedoms at work. The ratification of 60 ILO Conventions, including the eight fundamental Conventions, mostly since national independence in 1962, illustrated the commitment of his country to base its economic and social development on the principles set out in international Conventions and treaties. The national Constitution also gave importance to the freedoms and rights recognized for all citizens in the world of work, including freedom of association and the right to strike. In 2015 and 2017, the Government had provided all the information requested on specific cases or on the Labour Code. The previous year, when the case had been examined, of the 32 interventions made by members of the Committee, 26 had welcomed the progress made by the Government. The failure to take that into account amounted to a denial of democratic rules. Recalling that all activities had to be undertaken in compliance with the law, as required by Article 8(2) of the Convention, he reiterated the statement made the previous year to the Committee concerning the Autonomous National Union of Electricity and Gas Workers (SNATEGS), to the effect that the union was operating normally and that its members had decided voluntarily on its dissolution, in accordance with the provisions of labour laws and regulations and its by-laws. The authorities had simply noted its dissolution in October 2017. In relation to the cases of the workers referred to in the allegations, he referred to the detailed information provided in writing on that subject and indicated that, of the 86 cases listed, 76 had been resolved through reinstatement in their jobs, assignment to another job, or by retirement at the initiative of the worker concerned. With regard to the allegations of police violence during demonstrations, he recalled that the Government ensured the security and well-being of its citizens and the protection of property. The intervention of the police services was only warranted by the need to maintain public order. Such interventions were carried out in accordance with the law and in conformity with international
